Failure to deliver prisoner to successor in office. In an action against a sheriff for not delivering to his successor in office a prisoner taken by him and committed to jail on an execution against the body, averred to have been duly issued on a judgment in an action brought to recover a debt which was fraudulently contracted, it is not essential that the complaint should also state that an order of arrest was obtained.[47]

(2) Wrongful Levy on, and Seizure or Removal of, Property

(a) In general
(b) Under process against another person
(c) Exempt property
(d) Mortgaged property

(a) In General

In an action against an officer for a wrongful or illegal levy on, or seizure of, property, a petition which states a cause of action is sufficient, and reasonable certainty in the description of the property is all that is required.

In an action against an officer for a wrongful or illegal levy on, or seizure of, property, a petition which states a cause of action is sufficient.[48] Where plaintiff relies on the fact that the process under which the officer levied and sold had been superseded, he should not only state this fact in the petition or declaration,[49] but should also charge notice of the fact to the officer.[50] In action for fraudulent levy on the lands of plaintiff, and a return thereof to the court, whereby an order of sale was obtained, and the lands sold, it is necessary to state an eviction of plaintiff, or some disturbance by defendant, or by some person deriving a title under the sheriff's sale and conveyance.[51] In an action by one of two codefendants, claiming to be the surety of the other, against the sheriff for his failure to levy the executions, issued against both, on his principal's property, the complaint is bad if it does not allege that the court made an order directing the sheriff to levy the execution on, and exhaust the property of, the principal debtor before making a levy on the surety's property, and that the clerk indorsed a memorandum of such order on the executions[52]

Where it is sought to recover damages for loss of credit sustained by reason of a wrongful attachment, the petition is not demurrable for omitting to give the names of persons who refused plaintiff credit because of such attachment.[53] An allegation in the complaint that the writ of attachment was "duly issued" means that it was based on a debt and the affidavit required by statute.[54]

A complaint in an action against a sheriff for removing plaintiff's goods from a house about to be sold under a mortgage which alleges that the removal was done "wrongfully, maliciously, and without right," during a rainstorm, is not sufficient to show that the removal was effected in an oppressive or negligent manner.[55]

Allegations as to property. In an action for a wrongful seizure of property, reasonable certainty in the description of the property is all that is required;[56] but a petition, declaration, or complaint in an action against an officer for making an excessive levy is insufficient where it merely alleges a levy on, or seizure of, property of a greater value than the debt to be satisfied,[57] without stating whether the property was real or personal,[58] or, if personal, that it was divisible,[59] or that defendant in the process owned,[60] and the officer knew that he owned,[61] other property in the jurisdiction which the execution could have been levied on and which was of a sufficient amount to satisfy it.

Cure by pleading of another party. Where a sheriff's indemnitors have been brought in as defendants in an action against the sheriff for a wrongful levy, it has been held that, although the facts as to the giving of the indemnity and showing that the indemnitors are chargeable are not pleaded either in the complaint or in the answer of the sheriff, the defect is cured by the answer of the indemnitors, setting forth those facts [62]

(b) Under Process against Another Person

In an action against an officer for the seizure of property of the plaintiff under process against another, the complaint should contain averments sufficient to state the essential elements of a cause of action against the officer, but the plaintiff is not required to set out facts which constitute him the owner of the property

In an action against an officer for the seizure of property of plaintiff under process against another, the complaint should contain averments sufficient to state the essential elements of a cause of action against the officer.[63] Plaintiff is not required to set out the facts which constituted him the owner of the property,[64] and a petition which alleges that the goods were taken from plaintiff, and that defendant knew that they belonged to him, is sufficient as an averment of ownership where not excepted to.[65]

Seizure under attachment. Where plaintiff seeks to recover from the sheriff, for a wrongful seizure of his property under a writ of attachment, the money paid the sheriff for the surrender of the property to him, it must appear in the complaint that he was compelled to pay the money as a condition to the delivery of possession of the property detained,[66] that such detention was unlawful,[67] that the payment was made under protest,[68] and that the detention was attended by circumstances of hardship or inconvenience to plaintiff.[69]

Notice and demand. Ordinarily, in an action to recover the possession of property seized under process against another person in whose possession the property was, plaintiff must affirmatively allege notice and demand;[70] but, where a sheriff failed to comply with a statute requiring the return in claim and delivery to be made within a certain time after seizure of the property, it is not necessary for plaintiff in an action to recover property wrongfully seized to allege that he had served on the sheriff the affidavit and notice of his claim required by statute.[71]

Action against indemnitors. Where it is sought in an action against the indemnitors of the seizing officer to hold them as trespassers, the complaint must, in order to state a cause of action, allege that the seizure was induced by the giving of the indemnity bond.[72]

(c) Exempt Property

Although there is authority to the contrary, it has been held that in an action against a sheriff or his indemnitors for the seizure of exempt property, the complaint must show the plaintiff's right to the exemption, but it is not necessary specifically to plead any statute under which the property is claimed as exempt.

Although there is authority to the contrary,[73] it has been held that in an action against a sheriff or his indemnitors for the seizure of exempt property, the complaint must show plaintiff's right to the exemption[74] and that he has taken the steps required by statute to entitle him to assert the right.[75] However, it is not necessary specifically to plead any statute under which the property is claimed as exempt where facts making a case within the provisions of the statute are stated.[76] Likewise, express allegations that plaintiff is the head of a family[77] and a resident[78] and citizen[79] of the state are not necessary where the facts stated indicate that such is the case Where the action is one for refusing to allow plaintiff to select, as exempt, certain articles seized on execution, an allegation in the declaration that defendant, by his deputy, did convert the property to his own use is sufficient to show that the deputy was acting under defendant as sheriff.[80]

(d) Mortgaged Property

In an action by a mortgagee for seizure of mortgaged goods in his possession under process against the mortgagor, a complaint alleging peaceable possession, and that the taking was wrongful, and further alleging that the mortgagee had taken possession under the mortgage, states a cause of action.

In an action by a mortgagee for a seizure of the mortgaged goods in his possession under an attachment against the mortgagor, a complaint alleging peaceable possession, and that the taking was wrongful, and further alleging that the mortgagee had taken possession by virtue of a chattel mortgage executed to him by the attachment debtor, states a cause of action,[81] even though it does not affirmatively show any default in the mortgage[82] It is not necessary to allege that the demand made by plaintiff on the officer, as required by statute, contained a just and true account of the mortgage debt[83] Likewise, it is not necessary to plead the value of the goods taken, where no elements of special damage are pleaded,[84] but special damages are not recoverable unless pleaded[85]

(3) False Return

In an action for a false return the complaint must state the nature of the return made and show in what respect it was false or injurious to the plaintiff, but it need not allege deceit or fraud, or the giving of statutory notice to the officer or his deputy.

In an action for a false return, an averment that the officer "failed to make true and correct returns" is insufficient;[86] the complaint must state the nature of the return made,[87] and show in what respect it was false[88] or injurious to plaintiff,[89] but it need not allege deceit or fraud,[90] or the giving of statutory notice to the officer or his deputy.[91] It is proper to charge the false return to have been made when the writ was returnable, although it was actually made long afterward[92]

Construction. Where the complaint in an action against an officer for making a false return of service of summons on plaintiff, whereby judgment was rendered against plaintiff avers that plaintiff filed a motion to quash the alleged false return, it will be assumed, in the absence of any averment to the contrary, that such motion was made before judgment was rendered in the action.[93] Where the declaration, in an action on the case for the false return of a writ, avers that the writ was directed to defendant, as an indifferent person, to serve and return, and that, after it had been returned to the court to which it was returnable, plaintiff in that suit recovered judgment by default, this is equiv-

§ 156. Plea or Answer, and Subsequent Pleadings

a Plea or answer
b. Replication or reply
c Rejoinder

a. Plea or Answer

(1) In general
(2) To charges of particular defaults or misfeasances

(1) In General

Where, in an action against a sheriff or constable, a good cause of action is sufficiently alleged in the plaintiff's pleadings, the defendant must, by a proper plea or answer, raise an issue to make available any defense to which he may deem himself entitled. Where warranted by statute, a plea alleging the taking and return of an indemnity bond and notice to the plaintiff thereof should not be rejected, and, if the officer seeks to justify under process, such justification should be specially pleaded.

In an action against a sheriff or constable, defendant must, by a proper plea or answer, raise an issue to make available any defense to which he may deem himself entitled,[95] or, if the complaint is insufficient to state a cause of action, he must interpose a demurrer thereto.[96] Where an action against a sheriff or deputy sheriff falls within one of the classes of actions enumerated in a statute providing for less stringency in pleading in certain suits, he is entitled to the benefit of the statute,[97] even though he has taken indemnity.[98] Also, when a sheriff is sued, he is held to no greater diligence in pleading than a private individual,[99] and a default by him will be set aside and an answer permitted where the circumstances are such that it would be proper to grant such indulgence to an individual.[1]

Indemnity. In jurisdictions wherein it is provided by statute that the taking of an indemnity bond and the return thereof to the office of the clerk of court shall bar an action by a claimant of property against the officer, a plea alleging the taking and return of an indemnity bond and notice to plaintiff thereof should not be rejected[2] where the return was made before the action was begun,[3] even though after the time provided by statute [4]

Limitations. Where the statute provides that actions against sheriffs for any act in their official capacity shall be brought within three years after the cause of action shall have accrued, a plea in such action of "Not guilty within three years" is bad on a special demurrer for not following the terms of the statute,[5] although it might be good on general demurrer.[6]

Justification under office. Where defendant in an action for an alleged wrongful act seeks to justify under his office, he must, in his pleading, show a good title to such office.[7]

Justification under process. Where an officer seeks to justify under process, such justification must be specially pleaded,[8] and the plea must set forth matters which, if true, will bar the action.[9] In order to conform to this rule the plea should substantially describe the process,[10] state the facts relied on to justify the acts done under it,[11] and allege, where a seizure of property is complained of, that defendant in the process had some interest in the property seized subject to seizure,[12] or that the property was subject to the process;[13] but it is not necessary to state that defendant sold the property levied on.[14] Where the officer seeks to justify under mesne process, he must aver the return thereof,[15] or show some legal excuse for not returning it,[16] unless the action is brought before return day.[17] It has been held that, where a sheriff justifies under a writ of execution, it is not necessary to allege that a judgment was rendered in the case in which the execution issued,[18] or to set out the judgment;[19] but, as against a stranger to the writ, it has been held necessary to allege a valid judgment, as discussed infra subdivision a (2) of this section.

Cure by verdict. A defect or informality in an answer stating a defense may be cured by verdict.[20]

(2) To Charges of Particular Defaults or Misfeasances

The rule that, where a good cause of action is sufficiently alleged in the plaintiff's pleadings, the defendant must, by a proper plea or answer, raise an issue to make available any defense to which he may deem himself entitled has been applied to the pleas and answers of sheriffs and constables to charges of various defaults or misfeasances

In an action for not levying an execution on a particular lot of land pointed out by plaintiff in execution, a plea that, after return of such execution, plaintiff sued out another execution on the same judgment, which was, by his direction, levied on other property, is bad where it does not allege what disposition was made of the property under the levy.[21]

Wrongful levy or seizure. In an action for a wrongful attachment of exempt property, a waiver of exemption must, if relied on as a defense, be specially pleaded;[22] but, where it is not intended to plead a waiver, the answer should be confined to denials.[23]

Where an officer seeks to justify his seizure and possession of attached property as against a stranger to the writ who claims it, he must allege all the facts necessary to support the writ,[24] including the existence of a debt in favor of the attachment plaintiff against the attachment defendant.[25] If the seizure was under final process, the sheriff must plead that the property was taken under a valid execution[26] and judgment.[27] A plea alleging that the property was taken under an execution as the proper goods and chattels of the execution defendant is bad, as it does not traverse that plaintiff was the owner,[28] and in trespass de bonis against a sheriff, a plea that the goods belonged to a third person, and were taken by virtue of an execution against him, has been held bad, as amounting to the general issue.[29] Where the sheriff relies on the fact that a sale, mortgage, or pledge by the debtor to plaintiff was fraudulent, the fraud must be specially pleaded.[30] In an action to recover the possession of property seized under attachment against a person in whose possession the property was, it is not necessary for the sheriff to plead want of notice and demand from plaintiff.[31] In an action on an indemnifying bond it has been held that an answer denying plaintiff's ownership of the property is defective, if it fails to negative his ownership of any part thereof.[32]

In a plea of justification by an officer for taking property in satisfaction of a rate or tax imposed by an incorporated aqueduct company, it has been held sufficient to aver that by the act of incorporation the original proprietors were declared a body politic and corporate in fact, if such were the terms of the act, without averring the organization of the company.[33]

Improper sale or removal of property. In an action by an owner of chattels leased to a third person against an officer for selling them under an execution against the lessee, a plea that the officer sold only the right, title, and interest of the lessee and that plaintiff has not sustained, and will not sustain, any damages by reason of the sale is good.[34] or answer in an action for the loss,[35] wrongful release,[36] or conversion[37] of property by a sheriff or like officer will not be upheld unless it contains proper and sufficient allegations.

Loss, release, or conversion of property. A plea

Failure to produce or deliver property or pay over money In an action for failure to have attached property forthcoming to satisfy execution, a plea averring generally that the property had been appropriated in the manner prescribed by law in satisfaction of prior attachment liens is insufficient.[38] Where, in an action to recover money from an officer, the complaint alleges that defendant refused to pay plaintiff the money, and wrongfully retains and still holds the possession thereof, and the answer merely contains a denial "that defendant wrongfully retains or holds possession" of the sum or any part thereof, such denial operates merely to deny the "wrongful" possession[39] and constitutes an admission of possession.[40] On the other hand, in an execution sale, the purchaser's action against a sheriff for failure to deliver goods purchased, an answer denying that the sheriff "has failed and neglected, or failed or neglected, or refused, in any manner or at all, to deliver," is a sufficient denial of failure to deliver,[41] and an admission in the answer that actual possession was not delivered is not fatal where the answer declares that the property was not capable of manual delivery.[42]

False return. Where an action against a sheriff is for damages for a false return of an execution issued by plaintiff, an answer merely alleging the issuing of prior executions by other creditors should be stricken, where it does not aver that the prior executions had been or could be levied on the debtor's property, or that the property was exhausted by a sale under such prior executions.[43]

Escape. In an action for the escape from custody of a person arrested on a process for contempt, it is essential to the sufficiency of the answer that it contain averments amounting to a distinct allegation that the alleged escape was made without defendant's consent.[44] Where a declaration alleges the escape to have been in September, and the sheriff's pleas allege that the debtor was in custody in April, and admit that he has not been in custody subsequent to that time, it appears with sufficient certainty, on general demurrer, that the escape mentioned in the plea is the same escape for which the action was brought[45]

b. Replication or Reply

A reply or replication is not proper or necessary where the officer's plea or answer is merely a denial or amounts to a denial, and a new assignment may or may not be necessary according to the pleadings already filed in the particular case.

A reply or replication is not proper[46] or necessary[47] where the officer's plea or answer is merely a denial, or amounts to a denial, of plaintiff's cause of action. A new assignment may,[48] or may not,[49] be necessary according to the pleadings already filed in the particular case. Where a reply or replication is filed, it must be sufficient in contents.[50]

c. Rejoinder

Where the defendant in trespass justifies on the ground that he acted under the command of a lawful officer serving a warrant, and the replication sets forth that such officer had not qualified and, therefore, had no authority, a rejoinder that the officer was such de facto, and that the defendant believed him to be such de jure, is sufficient.

Where defendant in trespass justifies on the ground that he acted under the command of a lawful officer serving a warrant, and the replication sets forth that such officer had not qualified and, therefore, had no authority either to act himself or to compel defendant to act, a rejoinder that the

Failure to reply not an admission

Where the complaint in an action against a sheriff to recover property taken by him on attachment averred that plaintiff owned and was entitled to possession of the property in question, and the answer denied the averment, and set up that, at the time of the levy for the wrongful making of which defendant was sued, the property was possessed and owned by a third person, such averments were not new matter which was admitted by failure to file a replication—Woodworth v Knowlton, 22 Cal 164.

officer was such de facto, and that defendant believed him to be such de jure, and, therefore, might lawfully submit to his command, is sufficient.[51]

§ 157. Amendment of Pleadings

General rules governing the amendment of the pleadings have been applied in an action against a sheriff or constable, and as a general rule the court may in its discretion permit the pleadings to be amended where such course appears proper.

General rules governing the amendment of pleadings, as discussed in Pleadings §§ 275–282, have been applied in an action against a sheriff or constable.[52] As a general rule, the court may in its discretion permit the pleadings to be amended where such course appears proper,[53] or may refuse to allow an amendment which would in its opinion cause injustice[54] or be otherwise improper,[55] or unnecessary,[56] or strike out an improper amendment previously made.[57] Where, in an action against a sheriff for levying on property claimed by plaintiff under process against another, the indemnitors of the sheriff are brought in or substituted as defendants, as discussed supra § 153, it is not necessary for plaintiff to amend his complaint so as to show the nature of their liability.[58]

§ 158. Issues, Proof, and Variance

a. In general
b. Under general issue or denial

a. In General

The proof adduced in an action against a sheriff or constable must be within the issues presented, relate to the matters set up in the pleadings, and conform to and support, or at least not be materially variant from, the pleadings of the party by whom it is introduced, although sometimes the pleading or evidence of the defendant renders it proper for the plaintiff to introduce evidence of a matter not pleaded by him.

The proof adduced in an action against a sheriff or constable must be within the issues presented,[59] relate to matters set up in the pleadings,[60] and conform to and support,[61] or at least not be materially variant from,[62] the pleadings of the party by whom it is introduced or sought to be introduced. Sometimes, however, the pleading or evidence of defendant renders it proper for plaintiff to introduce evidence of a matter not pleaded by him,[63] the fact that plaintiff disproves a defense not made cannot prejudice defendant,[64] in an action to recover from a sheriff the amount received on a sale of property under execution, an order of court fixing the compensation of a special custodian in accordance with a statute providing that the court shall allow such compensation is admissible without being specially pleaded,[65] and an immaterial variance is not fatal.[66] The material allegations of the complaint or petition must be proved as laid,[67] unless such allegations are admitted by the answer;[68] but such proof is not necessary as to al-

Amendment after action barred

In an action against a sheriff for conversion, where the petition alleged that the levy of the execution was by him as sheriff, an amendment, filed after an action was barred, which alleged that the levy was made by a deputy sheriff, acting by authority of the sheriff, did not state a new cause of action—Herring v Patten, 44 S.W. 50, 18 Tex.Civ.App 147

legations which are merely surplusage.[69] A sheriff is not bound to prove all the facts set up in his defense if he proves enough to relieve him of legal liability;[70] and, where indemnitors, who have been made parties at the instance of the sheriff, have not answered his cross action, it is not necessary for him to put the indemnity bond in evidence to entitle him to judgment over against the indemnitors as by default.[71]

b. Under General Issue or Denial

Under the general issue or general denial it has been held that the defendant cannot show in evidence matters tending to excuse or justify merely, and not to disprove, the act or default complained of, but there is also authority to the contrary.

Under the general issue or a general denial it has been held that defendant cannot show in evidence matters tending to excuse or justify merely, and not to disprove, the act or default complained of,[72] unless, where such is the practice, notice has been given that defendant intends to show such matters,[73] but there is also considerable authority to the contrary.[74] At any rate, evidence tending merely to mitigate the damages, but not to justify the trespass complained of, is admissible under the general issue;[75] and evidence which refutes plaintiff's allegations[76] or evidence,[77] or both,[78] is admissible under a general denial.

§ 159. Presumptions and Burden of Proof

a. Presumptions
b. Burden of proof

a. Presumptions

Various presumptions have been held to exist, or not to exist, in actions against sheriffs or constables or their indemnitors.

The presumption of law that public officers have done their duty is generally applicable to sheriffs and constables and their deputies and assistants, as discussed in Evidence § 146 c; but such presumption will not be indulged as to the acts of one officer where the effect thereof would be to put another officer in default.[79] Where an officer is sued on the ground that he exceeded his authority, it is not to be presumed that he was justified by extraordinary circumstances;[80] and all presumptions are against an officer suppressing process of the court in his hands.[81] It will be presumed that proper steps were taken by the moving parties to secure process and place it in the hands of the sheriff;[82] that an officer acted legally[83] and in good faith[84] in making an attachment; that property on which a sheriff levied an execution was liable to the process,[85] that the statements in his return are true;[86] that he exercised proper care in respect of property in his official custody,[87] and that he properly applied, disbursed, or paid over money which came into his hands.[88] It is also presumed that a sheriff or constable knows his duty,[89] and, hence, when he is shown to have been guilty of misconduct, the presumption arises that his act was willful.[90] In an action against a sheriff for not executing process, if a writ of sequestration is proved to have issued, the presumption is that the citation also issued as prayed for in the petition.[91]

Where a sheriff, who has attached goods on process against a fraudulent vendee, refuses, on demand by the vendor, to deliver the goods, without requiring any evidence of the vendor's title, or expressing any doubts concerning it, the jury, in an action of trover by the vendor, may presume a waiver by the officer of any information on the subject.[92] It will not be conclusively presumed that a prisoner was injured by the arresting officer where he was unhurt when arrested by defendant and injured when brought into court the following day in defendant's custody,[93] if a prisoner returns after a voluntary escape, the affirmation of the recaption by plaintiff in execution, so as to destroy his right of action against the sheriff for the escape, will not be presumed,[94] where an officer who has attached a horse and wagon is seen driving them, there is no presumption that such use is unlawful;[95] and in an action against a sheriff for failure to return an execution, it will not be presumed without any allegation to that effect that he failed to pay over the money collected under the writ.[96]

Ownership In an action by a mortgagor against a sheriff for damages for having sold the mortgaged premises without giving due notice of sale, it will be presumed that the mortgagor was the owner of the premises at the time the mortgage was executed,[97] and in an action against an officer for neglect to seize property in a debtor's possession, it may be presumed that such property belonged to the debtor.[98]

Sufficiency of property to satisfy debt. Where an officer has failed to return an order for the sale of attached property, it will be presumed that the property was sufficient to satisfy the debt;[99] but, where, in an action for failure to levy sufficient property to satisfy the debt, plaintiff showed that the debtor possessed at the time of the levy property other than that levied on, without proving that such omitted property was substantially sufficient to satisfy the balance due, the court may not indulge a presumption that it was of such value.[1]

Loss, injury, or damage. Plaintiff in an action is presumed to have been injured by the failure of an officer to levy an attachment or execution on property in defendant's possession,[2] as well as by the failure of the officer to return an execution,[3] or make the money,[4] within the time prescribed by law. A like presumption will be indulged where the officer, after making a levy, left the property in defendant's possession without taking a bond and subsequently it could not be found.[5] The failure of a sheriff to execute bail process in a trover case is presumed to have damaged plaintiff to the extent of the final money judgment recovered by him against defendant in the action.[6] Where a sheriff allowed a debtor arrested on civil process to escape, the presumption is that the creditor lost the entire debt thereby.[7]

Where indemnity was given to a sheriff for the purpose of inducing him to levy on certain property, the presumption is that the indemnitors thereby made themselves parties to the trespass.[8] Where a sheriff holds two executions against the same debtor, on one of which he has received an indemnifying bond, and he levies and sells the property levied on, and an action on the bond is brought by a claimant of the property, it will be presumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the sheriff sold the property under the execution for which he was indemnified, rather than under that for which he had no indemnity.[9]

b. Burden of Proof

In an action against a sheriff or constable or his deputy for an official default or misfeasance, the burden rests on the plaintiff to make out his case, but, where the officer admits the act or omission complained of and seeks to justify it, he assumes the burden of proof as to the matters relied on in justification, and the burden of proof also rests on him where he sets up affirmative defenses resting on matters peculiarly within his knowledge.

In an action against a sheriff or constable or his deputy for an official default or misfeasance, the burden rests on plaintiff to make out his case,[10] and show the extent of the damage suffered by

Illegality of proceedings
Burden of establishing illegality of proceedings in action against sheriff was on party alleging wrongful act complained of.—Hall v. Smith, 176 N. E 558, 92 Ind.App. 509

In action for excessive levy, burden is on the debtor to show that the officer acted oppressively or that he

him;[11] but, where the officer admits the act or omission complained of and seeks to justify it, he assumes the burden of proof as to the matters relied on in justification,[12] and the burden of proof also rests on the officer where he sets up affirmative defenses resting on matters peculiarly within his knowledge.[13] Where a sheriff or constable justifies under his office, it is incumbent on him to establish his title to such office,[14] and, if he justifies under process, he must produce such process in evidence,[15] but, where he executed a search warrant which was regular on its face, and was issued by an officer duly authorized to issue it, it is improper to place on him the burden of proving the truth of the facts set out in the complaint on which the search warrant was issued,[16] even though he himself filed the complaint.[17]

In actions for particular defaults or misfeasances. The foregoing rules as to the burden of proof are applicable in actions for: Failure to serve, levy, or otherwise execute process,[18] record an attachment lien,[19] or indorse on an execution the date of its delivery to the officer,[20] a wrongful levy on, or seizure of, property,[21] or an unlawful arrest on execution,[22] service of a writ of replevin without taking a bond;[23] loss,[24] release,[25] or wrongful sale of,[26] or a delay in selling,[27] property, a wrongful purchase of the property by the sheriff before levy,[28] wrongfully, maliciously, and without probable cause procuring the issuance of a search warrant and for wrongful search thereunder,[29] escape intended to do defendant a wrong under authority of the writ in his hands—Bridwell v. Anderson, 156 S W 2d 231, 203 Ark 69—57 C.J p 965 note 85 [a] (2).

b. Documentary evidence

a. In General

Any competent and material evidence which tends to establish or refute the contentions of either party, or to indicate the amount which should be recovered, is admissible in an action against a sheriff or constable or his deputy, but evidence which is irrelevant, immaterial, or is otherwise objectionable under the general rules of evidence may and should be excluded.

Provided it is within the pleadings and issues made thereby, as discussed supra § 158, any competent and material evidence which tends to establish or refute the contentions of either party,[39] or to indicate the amount which should be recovered by the successful party,[40] is admissible in an action against a sheriff or constable or his deputy, such as an action against such officer for a failure to execute process,[41] a wrongful levy on, or seizure of, property,[42] a release of goods which have been seized by the officer,[43] a failure to sell property which has been levied on,[44] a wrongful sale,[45] the taking of insufficient bail[46] or insufficient sureties on a bond,[47] a failure to return an attachment,[48] a failure to record an attachment resulting in a loss of preference,[49] a false return of process,[50] a false arrest,[51] wrongfully, maliciously, and without probable cause procuring issuance of search warrant

51. Arrest outside jurisdiction
Acts of deputy sheriffs in arresting a man in a jurisdiction outside that in which warrant issued and returning with him to jurisdiction issuing warrant were "colore officii," although void and without legal authority, and evidence thereof was properly submitted to jury in action against sheriff and such deputies for false arrest—Drake v. Keeling, 299 N.W. 919, 230 Iowa 1038.

and for wrongful search thereunder,[52] or an escape of a person taken in custody on mesne process.[53] Plaintiff may introduce evidence tending to show that the officer was actuated by bad faith or malice in what he did,[54] while on his part the officer may introduce evidence tending to show that he acted honestly and in good faith.[55]

On the other hand, evidence which is irrelevant,[56] immaterial,[57] tends merely to prejudice the jury against one of the parties,[58] or is otherwise objectionable under the general rules of evidence[59] may and should be excluded in an action against a sheriff or constable or his deputy, such as an action against such officer for failure to execute process,[60] a wrongful or illegal levy on, or seizure of, property,[61] a release of property from an attachment on a claim of exemption,[62] failure to pay over money held by a deputy as custodian,[63] a wrongful sale of property under an execution,[64] failure to file an order of sale, with the return thereon, in the clerk's office,[65] failure to return an execution,[66] a false return of process,[67] wrongfully, maliciously, and without probable cause procuring the issuance of a search warrant and for wrongful search thereunder,[68] a wrongful killing by an alleged deputy,[69] or an escape.[70] It is not error to refuse to admit certain evidence in bar of the action where it is admitted in mitigation of damages and, if believed, will make the damages only nominal.[71]

In action on indemnity bond, competent evidence showing the loss plaintiff sustained is properly admitted,[72] but it may not be prejudicial error to exclude remote and indefinite circumstantial evidence,[73] or evidence which is competent only for the purpose of contradicting a witness.[74]

b. Documentary Evidence

(1) In general
(2) Process and return

(1) In General

General rules governing the admissibility of documentary evidence have been applied in actions against a sheriff or constable or his indemnitors.

Subject to the general rules governing admission of such evidence, documentary evidence may[75] or may not[76] be received in an action against a sheriff or constable or his indemnitors for an official default or misfeasance. Where claimant brings trespass against plaintiff in execution, the officer making the levy and the sureties on the bond of indemnity given the officer, the bond is competent evidence to connect the sureties with the alleged trespass.[77] Where the holder of a note secured by chattel mortgages sues an officer for levying on and selling the mortgaged chattels under execution against the mortgagor, the note is not admissible without proof of its execution.[78]

Generally,[79] but not always,[80] the record and proceedings in the action in which process issued are admissible in an action against an officer for his alleged default or misconduct in respect of the execution of such process. Whether a judgment, or the record thereof, in an action other than the one in which the process in question issued is admissible depends on the purpose for which it is offered in evidence.[81] In an action against a sheriff for failure to return property attached in a prior action after dissolution of the attachment it has been held that the verdict and judgment in the prior action are admissible in evidence.[82]

(2) Process and Return

In an action against an officer or his indemnitors for an official default or misfeasance in connection with the execution of process, it is ordinarily proper to admit in evidence the process under which the officer acted and his return thereon, and writs other than the one involved may be admissible for limited purposes.

In an action against an officer or his indemnitors for an official default or misfeasance in connection with the execution of process, it is ordinarily proper to admit in evidence the process under which the officer acted,[83] and his return thereon;[84] but sometimes the circumstances may call for the exclusion of the process,[85] or the return thereon,[86] or both.[87] Writs other than the one involved may be admissible for limited purposes[88] and, even though the action is for accepting insufficient sureties, where plaintiff seeks to prove the insufficiency of the bond by showing that he brought suit on it and had been unable to realize anything therefrom, the return of the officer on the execution issued therein is admissible.[89]

Copies. Where deputy sheriffs had seized property in a claim and delivery action, and the clerk of the court testified that there were no papers on file in the action, it has been held that copies of the papers served on defendant are admissible.[90] to support or defeat a recovery,[33] shift the burden of proof,[34] or indicate the amount which should be recovered by the successful party.[35]

Where the sheriff's indemnitors have been substituted in an action against the sheriff for the wrongful seizure of plaintiff's property, proof of a right to recover against the sheriff will authorize a recovery against the substituted defendants,[36] and, where judgment has been rendered against the sheriff in a replevin action, it is conclusive on his indemnitors in an action by the owner of the property against them.[37]

b. Conclusiveness of Officer's Return

The return of the sheriff is conclusive against him, and a deputy's return cannot be contradicted by either the deputy or the sheriff, but the return is not conclusive in favor of the officer, or against the party seeking to hold him liable.

The return of the sheriff is conclusive against him,[38] and he cannot be allowed to introduce evidence contradicting it.[39] Also, a deputy's return cannot be contradicted by either the deputy[40] or the sheriff.[41] While the return is not conclusive in favor of the officer,[42] or against the party seeking to hold him liable for an official default or misfeasance,[43] it has been held to be prima facie evidence in favor of the officer.[44]

a. In General

General rules governing the trial of civil actions have been applied in actions against sheriffs, constables, or indemnitors, as with respect to the order of proof, continuances, and questions proper for determination.

General rules governing the trial of civil actions have been applied in actions against sheriffs, constables, or indemnitors.[45] At the trial of an action against an officer for taking property which plaintiff claims, on levy of an execution against another, on plaintiff adducing evidence of his right to the property, if the officer relies on the fact that the property was in the possession of such other person at the time of the taking, he must adduce evidence to show that it was in such possession, under circumstances raising a presumption of ownership in such person;[46] and plaintiff, in reply thereto, if he relies on an affidavit claiming the property under the statute, or on notice, must then prove it.[47] In trespass against a person for entering plaintiff's premises, defendant cannot introduce in evidence an execution against plaintiff and a written authority from a sheriff, empowering him to levy the execution on the property of plaintiff, without first introducing evidence to show that the person from whom he received the authority was then the sheriff.[48]

Continuances. It has been held that a statute providing that, when a court has allowed the principal and surety on an indemnity bond to be made codefendants in an action against a sheriff for a wrongful seizure, a continuance "may" be granted to allow service on such codefendants is mandatory,[49] and the allowance of such continuance does not rest in the court's discretion.[50]

Questions proper for determination. Where, in an action against a sheriff for money collected under a delinquent tax judgment, the sheriff claims the right to withhold a part of the fund for costs, the question of his right thereto may be properly determined.[51] Where a sheriff is sued for not keeping attached goods, so that they might be forthcoming to satisfy an execution, and he shows in defense, for the purpose of proving a dissolution of the attachment, that the estate of the judgment debtor was assigned before judgment, plaintiff cannot be permitted to contest the validity of the assignment by showing irregularities in the proceedings had against the debtor under the insolvent law.[52]

b. Questions for Court and Jury

Where the evidence is sufficient to warrant the submission of the case to the jury, and there are disputed questions of fact to be determined, the case should be submitted to the jury for the determination of such questions, and the court should not dismiss the action, order a nonsuit, or direct a verdict for the defendant.

a verdict for defendant[57] A failure to prove all the allegations of the complaint will not warrant a dismissal where enough is proved to support the cause of action.[58] On the other hand, questions of law must be passed by the court, rather than by the jury;[59] and a question of law, within the meaning of this rule, may pertain to a matter as to which there is no controversy or uncertainty, and no room for opposing inferences, in the evidence[60] Whether a sheriff has used reasonable diligence in endeavoring to arrest a debtor on execution is a mixed question of law and fact[61] An immaterial question need not be submitted to the jury[62] Where there is a complete failure of proof as to facts essential to plaintiff's right to recover, it is proper to dismiss the complaint when plaintiff closes his case,[63] order a nonsuit,[64] or direct a verdict for defendant.[65] Also, a verdict for defendant may and should be directed where undisputed evidence shows that he is entitled to a verdict.[66]

Direction of verdict for plaintiff. Where plaintiff has introduced evidence prima facie sufficient to entitle him to recover, and defendant introduces no controverting evidence, it is proper and necessary to direct a verdict for plaintiff.[67] Also, in an action for damages for the attachment of exempt property, plaintiff is entitled to a directed verdict, leaving the damages to the jury, where the exemption, taking on attachment, demand, and refusal are admitted.[68]

such as to mislead, or be liable to mislead, the jury.[75] The court should not give instructions which assume matters in controversy,[76] are predicated on a state of facts not established by the evidence,[77] or ignore, or exclude from consideration, matters which have been properly brought before the jury.[78] Although the evidence as a whole tends to show that plaintiff is either the owner of all the property or of none of it, but is such that the jury might believe the evidence as to one part of the property but not the other, it is proper to instruct the jury that if they believe plaintiff is the owner of the property, "or any part thereof," they will find for him the value of the property, or of such part as they believe from the evidence he owned at the time of the levy.[79]

d. Verdict and Findings

The general rules governing the findings of the court or jury in civil actions are applicable in an action against a sheriff or constable.

The general rules governing the findings of the court or jury in civil actions are applicable in determining the necessity of findings as to particular matters,[80] the construction of findings which have been made,[81] and their sufficiency to warrant or support a judgment for plaintiff[82] or defendant,[83] in an action against a sheriff or constable

Contradiction. A verdict that the sheriff suffered a prisoner "voluntarily and negligently to escape" has been held contradictory and insufficient.[84] There is no conflict between a general verdict against a sheriff in an action of trespass and a special finding that he acted oppressively.[85]

§ 163. Judgment and Enforcement Thereof

General rules governing judgments have been applied in actions against sheriffs and constables and their indemnitors.

General rules governing judgments have bee applied in actions against sheriffs and constable and their indemnitors.[86] Where the owner of at tached property, which has been destroyed throug negligence, sues the sheriff for the value of th property, and the attaching creditor is made a par ty, and awarded a sufficient portion of the judg ment to satisfy his debt, the sheriff is not prejudiced by the fact that the judgment against him is for the whole amount.[87] An officer who gives in evidence in justification the process under which he made the seizure complained of is entitled to judgment, although the suit is brought in favor of one who claims the property by virtue of a sale from the person as whose the property was seized, where the jury have found the sale to be fraudulent against the creditors of the vendor.[88] Where, in an action against a sheriff for refusing to sell land on execution, the court has found that the complicated condition of the title justified the sheriff in refusing to sell, it is proper to render a decree directing the sale, but exonerating the sheriff, where no damages appear to have been sustained.[89] Where an action on a sheriff's indemnifying bond was dismissed as to the sureties, but continued as to the principal, and there are issues with respect to an oral contract of indemnity preceding the bond, it has been held proper to deny a motion for judgment for defendant notwithstanding the verdict for plaintiff, on the ground that the complaint does not state a sufficient cause of action on the oral contract of indemnity, where it is sufficient, counting on the bond, to support the judgment.[90]

Enforcement. Under some statutes a judgment against a sheriff may be enforced by an execution against the body where an execution against property has proved unavailing.[91] A statute authorizing a stay of proceedings on a judgment against the sheriff for an escape until he can collect of the bondsman of the escaped judgment debtor confers a discretionary power on the court, which will not be exercised where the sheriff has not proceeded with diligence.[92] It has been held that a transcript of a judgment of a justice of the peace against a constable for not returning an execution may be filed in the court of common pleas and an execution issued from that court, without any previous issuance of an execution from the justice.[93] Where an officer who is sued for failure to execute a writ of execution has the obligors in a claim bond under which the property levied on was taken from him made parties to the suit, so that, in case of judgment against him, he may have judgment over against them, he cannot enforce the judgment over until he has paid the judgment against him.[94] Money recovered by defendant sheriff on a judgment in his favor for the value of property attached in a proceeding which is still pending will be held by him subject to the attachment process.[95]

Payment of judgment by state or political subdivision. A statute providing for the payment of judgments for damages against public officers by the state or political subdivision of which he is an officer has been held to protect marshals, constables, and the like,[96] but not sheriffs [97]

Equitable relief against judgment. A judgment entered against a sheriff, under a mistaken view of the clerk that a bail piece was insufficient, may be relieved against in equity;[98] and it has been held that, where judgment has been obtained against a sheriff for failing to return an execution, he may have relief in equity by showing that, as between plaintiff and defendant in the execution, it ought never to have been collected.[99]

As a general rule the actual injury sustained by the plaintiff in consequence of the act or default complained of furnishes the measure of damages in an action against a sheriff or constable or his indemnitors, and special damages cannot be recovered where not sufficiently alleged in the petition or complaint.

As a general rule the actual injury sustained by plaintiff in consequence of the act or default complained of furnishes the measure of damages in an action against a sheriff or constable or his indemnitors for official misfeasance or nonfeasance;[1] but the officer should not be held liable for losses which are remotely consequential [2]

Mental pain and suffering. The acts of the sheriff must have been willful or intentional in order to justify a recovery of damages for mental pain and suffering where there is no physical injury.[3] Where an attachment was illegally and maliciously levied on exempt property of a married woman, by reason of which she was compelled to suffer from cold and exposure, it has been held that she can recover full compensation for all injuries sustained, mental as well as material,[4] but, in the absence of fraud, malice, or other aggravating circumstances, mental suffering is not an element of damages for the acts or negligence of an officer with respect to personal property.[5]

Special damages cannot be recovered where not sufficiently alleged in the petition or complaint.[6]

Nominal damages. An award of nominal damages is proper where a wrongful act has been committed or a duty negligently omitted by the officer

Conversion

Where a sale of property under execution is void and the property is not returned, the rule applicable in cases of conversion of personal property should govern, and recovery should be of the reasonable value of the property at the time of levy, with interest, not to exceed the amount of the bond.—Mead v. Blurton, Mo.App., 189 S W. 637.

Interest

In proceeding to recover from sheriff damages arising out of sheriff's conduct of alleged unlawful foreclosure sale, where there was no plea that mortgagee was prevented from receiving amount bid at sale, interest on amount bid at sale was not recoverable item of damage—Dallas Joint Stock Land Bank of Dallas v. but no real injury is shown to have resulted therefrom.[7]

Attorney's fees charged a claimant of property in his intervention proceedings in an attachment suit may not, in the absence of a statute so providing, be recovered in a suit by him on an indemnifying bond.[8]

§ 165. —— Mitigation of Damages

Facts which legitimately tend to show that the injury to the plaintiff was not as great as he claims are proper for consideration in mitigation of damages.

Facts which legitimately tend to show that the injury to plaintiff was not as great as he claims are proper for consideration in mitigation of damages.[9] Plaintiff's lack of diligence in pursuing his remedy after default may be shown in mitigation of damages.[10] Where, pending a suit against an officer for wrongful attachment, plaintiff assigned his cause of action to one to whom the officer had delivered the property, taking his receipt therefor, stipulating that it would be returned on demand, it has been held that a refusal of the receiptor to deliver the property on demand may not be shown in mitigation of damages, where the officer did not offer to surrender the receipt and release him from his obligation.[11]

§ 166. —— Punitive or Exemplary Damages

Punitive or exemplary damages may be awarded where it appears that the officer has acted corruptly, wantonly, maliciously, or oppressively.

Punitive or exemplary damages may be awarded where it appears that the officer has acted corruptly, wantonly, maliciously, or oppressively,[12] but it is otherwise in the absence of such showing.[13] The malicious motives of plaintiff in the writ under which an officer acted cannot be imputed to the latter so as to furnish ground for an award of exemplary damages.[14] Exemplary damages have been held not to be recoverable in an action by a claimant on an indemnifying bond.[15]

For act or default of deputy A sheriff cannot be held liable in punitive damages for the misconduct of his deputy,[16] unless he authorized,[17] participated in,[18] or ratified[19] such misconduct: and, where plaintiff seeks to charge the sheriff with punitive damages on the ground of ratification, he should, before commencing the action, make his cause of action complete by informing the principal of the facts and giving him an opportunity of redressing the wrong before being forced to defend it.[20]

an action by a mortgagee against an officer for levying on the mortgaged property, the court erroneously decided that the mortgage was void and that no right could be asserted thereunder, and gave judgment for defendant, the fact that the record does not show that defendant ever levied on or sold the property is no ground for affirming the judgment.[23]

In so far as general rules governing review are applicable in actions against sheriffs or constables, they are discussed in Appeal and Error.

b. Costs

A sheriff who has been guilty of negligence is properly adjudged to pay costs.

A sheriff who has been guilty of negligence is properly adjudged to pay costs,[24] even though he has been guilty of no actual corruption or intentional fraud.[25] While it is not proper to tax against the officer costs incurred by reason of other persons being made defendants,[26] he will not, on the substitution of an indemnitor as defendant, be awarded anything for expenses where he has incurred none.[27]

VII. SUMMARY PROCEEDINGS AGAINST OFFICERS

§ 168. Availability of Remedy and Persons Entitled Thereto

a. In general
b. Defaults for which summary remedies available
c. Considerations affecting availability of summary remedies

a. In General

A statute providing for the institution of summary proceedings against an officer to establish and enforce his liability, or to compel the performance by him of duties devolving upon him under law, or to remedy an official mistake, is penal in nature and is to be strictly construed

Under permissive statute summary proceedings may be brought against an officer to establish and enforce his liability,[28] or to compel the performance by him of duties devolving on him under law,[29] or to remedy an official mistake.[30] Such a summary remedy is cumulative to the remedy by action,[31] but the complaining party is put to his election and cannot pursue both remedies at the same time.[32] The pendency of an action, however, against an officer and his surety for an official delinquency in failing to collect an execution when it was in his hands, and for making a false return thereon, is no bar to the prosecution of a summary remedy against them to recover statutory damages for the failure of the officer to return the execution within the proper time.[33]

Since statutes giving such summary remedies are penal in nature,[34] they are to be strictly construed,[35] and not extended beyond the cases for which they were, by their terms, intended to provide, as discussed infra subdivision b of this section, and a statute will not be held to authorize summary proceedings unless such intent is clear.[36] When a summary remedy is invoked, there must be strict compliance with all the statutory requirements.[37] No such proceedings can be maintained in the absence of statutory authority,[38] and when a statute authorizing a summary judgment against an officer is repealed without a saving clause there can be no judgment subsequently entered thereunder, even in proceedings begun before the repeal.[39] However, it has been held that where a sheriff is an officer of the court, the court has power to control his conduct when acting under color of its authority, and hence may summarily order him to refund the money collected under a process improperly issued.[40]

Proceedings against deputies. Statutes providing summary remedies against officers are not available against deputies[41] except where a legislative intent to the contrary clearly appears.[42] Where so provided by statute, a sheriff has the right to proceed summarily against his deputy for an official default.[43]

Persons entitled to summary remedy. The right to a remedy by summary proceedings against a sheriff or constable belongs only to the persons or parties for whose benefit the remedy is provided by statute,[44] and ordinarily a proceeding may be maintained only by one injured by the default on which it is based.[45] A solicitor pro tempore of the county court who obtains an order allowing him fees may proceed against an officer for money collected in such court for fines and forfeitures.[46] An execution plaintiff does not, by opposing a claim made to property levied on, waive the right to proceed summarily against the officer for failing to make the money.[47]

Institution by court sua sponte. When the statute designates the party or person by whom summary proceedings shall be instituted the court cannot take such proceedings on its own motion.[48]

b. Defaults for Which Summary Remedies Available

Summary remedies against a sheriff or constable are available for such acts and defaults as are specified by statute and not for any other official default or misconduct.

Summary remedies against a sheriff or constable, under statutes providing therefor, ordinarily are applicable to cases of neglect of duty[49] as well as to those of active misconduct.[50] Such remedies are, however, available for such acts or defaults only as are specified by the statute,[51] and not for any other official default or misconduct[52] A statute providing a summary remedy ordinarily is not to be given retroactive effect, so as to apply to a pre-existing default.[53]

Defaults of deputies. Under a statute providing a summary remedy against a sheriff or constable, such a proceeding may be maintained against an officer for the official default or misconduct of his deputy within the terms of the statute.[54]

Particular defaults. Under the various statutes it has been held that a sheriff or constable may be proceeded against summarily for failure to execute process,[55] delay in levying under an execution,[56]

failure to arrest defendant in a body execution,[57] failure to make or collect the money on a writ,[58] failure to pay over money collected[59] or received[60] by him by virtue of his office, paying over money in his hands to the wrong person,[61] failure to comply with an order made in summary proceedings directing him to pay over money,[62] failure to pay over the amount realized by a sale of property in his official capacity, whether or not he receives the money,[63] failure to account for the amount realized by hiring out property in his official custody,[64] failure to sell property levied on,[65] failure to take bond or security when it became his duty to do so,[66] failure to return process[67] within the proper time,[68] making a false[69] or insufficient[70] return, permitting the escape of a debtor arrested on civil process,[71] or failure to release an execution on defendant being adjudged a bankrupt.[72] An officer cannot be held liable on motion for omission to collect more than the usual rate of interest on a judgment where neither the execution nor the judgment directs it to be done.[73]

c. Considerations Affecting Availability of Summary Remedies

Summary remedies provided by statute for defaults of a sheriff or constable are available only when a plain and undisputed duty has been willfully neglected, and not where the officer's duty or liability is fairly open to dispute.

Summary remedies provided by statute for defaults of a sheriff or constable are available only when a plain and undisputed duty has been willfully neglected, and not where the officer's duty or liability is fairly open to dispute.[74] Accordingly, where there are conflicting claims to money in an officer's hands, he cannot be proceeded against summarily by one of the claimants for failure to pay it over, but is entitled to have the question as to who is entitled to the money determined in a civil action to which all the claimants may be made parties.[75] A party who has acquiesced in the acts of a sheriff or constable cannot proceed against him summarily for such acts unless there has been some fraud or collusion.[76] Summary remedies ordinarily are not available against a sheriff or constable where no injury has resulted to the complaining party from the officer's act or default.[77]

§ 169. Method of Proceeding

The method of proceeding summarily against a sheriff or constable, under a statute providing for summary proceedings, ordinarily is prescribed by the statute.

The method of proceeding summarily against a sheriff or constable, under a statute providing for summary proceedings, ordinarily is prescribed by the statute. Execution proper on record

Judgment creditor was not entitled to judgment on motion against sheriff and bondsmen for insufficient, false, or nonreturn of execution appearing proper on record—Farmers' Bank v Wyatt, supra.

Successor sheriff

On a statutory motion to recover damages for failure to return executions on return-day against succeeding sheriff where executions were delivered to former sheriff, and were never placed in successor sheriff's hands for execution and were never in his office or in his possession at any time after he qualified as sheriff, he was not liable—Parks v. Herrington, Miss, 56 So.2d 836.

the alleged default is ordered;[79] and an officer may proceed against his deputy by motion for a failure to pay over money collected by the deputy on executions placed in his hands.[80] An officer may properly be proceeded against on the same motion for a failure to pay over money collected on an execution and a failure to return the execution, and judgment may be rendered for either cause.[81] In the absence of statute authorizing a remedy by motion, or in a case not within the statute, no such remedy is available.[82]

Scire facias. Under a permissive statute the liability of a sheriff or constable for an official default may be enforced by scire facias.[83] A scire facias to subject an officer as special bail, by reason of his default in not taking a bail bond, need not set forth the declaration in the original action, but it must show how he became bail, by stating that the writ in the original action came into his hands as such officer, and that he arrested defendant therein and neglected to take a bail bond.[84] A statute providing a remedy against an officer by scire facias for failing to make due return of process or to pay over moneys collected or received by him does not make such remedy available for permitting an escape under a civil arrest.[85]

§ 170. —— Rule or Order to Show Cause

In a number of jurisdictions a usual remedy against a sheriff or constable who has failed in the discharge of his duty is by a rule nisi, or rule or order to show cause why he should not pay to the person injured by his default the amount which prima facie such person has lost because of such default.

In a number of jurisdictions a usual remedy against a sheriff or constable who has failed in the discharge of his duty is by a rule nisi, or rule or order to show cause why he should not pay to the person injured by his default the amount which prima facie such person has lost in consequence thereof,[86] together with any statutory penalty to which the officer has become subject through such default,[87] and the performance of duties devolving on the sheriff is also ordinarily compelled by rule.[88] Two or more writs of fieri facias may be introduced in one rule nisi against the officer,[89] and, where such officer has simultaneously collected different sums by process in several different actions against the same defendant, one order requiring him to pay it over may be properly made in all the actions.[90] When a prima facie case is made against an officer, either on affidavit or other sufficient proof, a rule nisi is granted as of course,[91] and surplusage in the affidavit will not impair its effect.[92] A rule against an officer to show cause should be given a fair and reasonable construction so as not to work oppressively on him,[93] but should not be so construed as to allow him to take his own time to prepare to be heard or to require the court to wait until he is ready.[94] Where, pending a rule against him, the officer is guilty of a new default, such default may be alleged by way of amendment to the rule, and the rule may be made absolute as a consequence of that default.[95] A promise by an officer to pay money for which he is liable because of a failure to make the money on an execution will not warrant a rule for failing to pay over money collected.[96]

Form and sufficiency. A rule on an officer to pay over money collected on execution must state the court in which the judgment was rendered on which the execution issued.[97] A rule setting forth at its head the name of plaintiff and defendant in the fieri facias, the amount of the principal and interest at the date of the judgment, and the court to which the fieri facias is returnable, and alleging that the officer has had the fieri facias long enough to have made the money, is not demurrable for want of certainty.[98] Where an officer has received money on a fieri facias, exceptions to the sufficiency of a rule against him, taken on the trial, long after the filing of the rule, come too late[99]

Rule absolute. A rule ordinarily is made absolute on the officer's failure to excuse his default[1] A rule is properly discharged, however, where the effect of making it absolute would be to prevent the officer from obeying the mandate of a coordinate court;[2] and on a rule against an officer to show cause why he should not be compelled to pay over the amount of an execution in his hands it is not proper to give summary relief in the premises by ordering him to pay the money or to stand committed, where it appears that he has not made the money thereon.[3] Although an officer has become liable for a debt by allowing a defendant, arrested on a ne exeat, to leave without giving sufficient bail, an order will not issue against the officer to compel him to pay the debt without first giving him time to produce defendant or to recover the debt on the bail bond.[4]

Service. It has been held that an order or rule on a sheriff or constable should be served on him by copy, and not by reading it to him[5] The rule cannot properly be served until after the default has occurred or become complete.[6]

Vacation or setting aside. A rule absolute against a sheriff or constable for failure does not, like a judgment, operate as an estoppel,[7] but rests on the fact of a contempt by the sheriff,[8] and may be set aside by the court for sufficient cause,[9] as where the charge of contempt is disproved[10] A peremptory order made without notice to the officer is properly set aside and vacated[11]

§ 171. —— Contempt Proceedings

It has been held proper to proceed summarily against a sheriff or constable for an official default by attachment, by a rule to show cause why an attachment should not issue, or by other proceedings as for contempt

It has been held proper to proceed summarily against a sheriff or constable for an official default by attachment,[12] by a rule to show cause why an attachment should not issue,[13] or by other proceedings as for contempt.[14] It does not necessarily follow, however, from the fact that an officer would be liable under the law in an action on the case against him for a particular default that he is liable to proceedings for contempt of court,[15] since ordinarily there is no liability in the latter proceeding where the officer acted reasonably and in good faith.[16] On an attachment against an officer for not returning a fieri facias, it has been held that the court may properly order him to recognize in double the amount of the fieri facias[17] and direct that he shall answer such interrogatories as may be regularly exhibited[18] Where an attachment against an officer for not returning an execution is not accompanied by instructions in what amount to take the recognizance for the officer's appearance, and a recognizance is taken for a smaller amount than the execution, and the officer does not appear on his recognizance, plaintiff may, on motion, proceed by an alias attachment without a suit on the recognizance.[19]

Purging contempt. An attachment or other summary proceeding against a sheriff or constable as for contempt is properly dissolved where such officer purges himself of the contempt, as by performment out of debtor's personalty and realty, unsatisfied until almost seven months after delivery was held guilty of contempt for failure to perform statutory duties, where debtor owned undivided interest in personalty at time execution was issued and for several months thereafter, and during seven months' period judgment creditor's attorneys notified sheriff of such interest by letter and personally —Cordts v. Reuter, supra.

a. In General

A demand ordinarily is a condition precedent to a summary proceeding by notice and motion against a sheriff or constable for failure to pay over the amount made on an execution. Jurisdiction of summary proceedings against a sheriff or constable usually is in the court out of which issued the process in connection with which the default occurred.

A demand ordinarily is a condition precedent to a summary proceeding by notice and motion against a sheriff or constable for failure to pay over the amount made on an execution,[23] but a personal demand is not a prerequisite to contempt proceedings against an officer who fails to pay over money after service on him of an order requiring such payment,[24] and it is not necessary that an officer be ruled or notified to return process before summary proceedings may be instituted against him for failure to make a return[25]

Jurisdiction. Jurisdiction of summary proceedings against a sheriff or constable belongs to such court as may be given it by the statute providing for such proceedings,[26] and ordinarily is in the court out of which issued the process in connection with which the default occurred[27] or to which such process is returnable,[28] rather than in any other court,[29] unless grounds for relief in such other court are specially pleaded.[30] It has been held that a court of one county may entertain summary proceedings against the sheriff of another county for defaults in respect of the execution of its process,[31] but there is also authority to the contrary.[32] Where a motion presents two separate and distinct causes of action, as to one of which the court is without jurisdiction, a demurrer to the motion is properly sustained,[33] but before dismissing the motion opportunity must be given to the moving party to amend by striking the cause as to which there is no jurisdiction.[34]

Time for instituting proceedings. Where a statute limits the time within which summary proceedings against a sheriff or constable may be instituted, the remedy is lost if proceedings are not begun within such time,[35] and it has been held that, even though a general statute with respect to the commencement of actions against such officers does not by its terms apply to proceedings as for contempt, it is applicable in its spirit and intent and the court has power to withhold the exercise of its jurisdiction in a summary proceeding on motion against an officer whenever an action for the claim sought to be enforced is barred by the statute of limitations.[36] In the absence of statute summary proceedings must be instituted within a reasonable time after the default.[37] As a general rule the summary remedy against an officer for a default with respect to the execution of process is not limited to the return term, but may be sought at a subsequent term,[38] and a statute providing for summary proceedings to be instituted at a particular term does not require that the judgment shall be rendered at such term.[39] It has been held that an officer may be proceeded against summarily after he has gone out of office,[40] but there is also authority to the contrary.[41]

b. Defenses

Anything which would constitute a valid defense for an officer in an action on the case for an official default is equally available as a defense in a summary proceeding against him.

Since summary proceedings against a sheriff or constable are a mere substitute for the more tedious and expensive remedy by action,[42] anything which would constitute a valid defense for an officer in an action on the case for an official default is equally available as a defense in a summary proceeding against him,[43] but an officer against whom a rule absolute is granted at one term and an attachment nisi at the next cannot, in answer to the latter, set up grounds decided against him before the rule was made absolute.[44] In a contempt of court proceeding against a constable for losing property of which he had been custodian, the constable may set up as a defense that the property was intrusted by him to another person for safe-keeping, that such property was stolen, and that both his conduct and that of the person to whom the property was intrusted were in good faith.[45]

c. Notice or Process

Generally, under statutes providing for summary proceedings against sheriffs and constables for official defaults, such a proceeding must be preceded by notice to the officer or the issuance of process advising him of the proceedings against him.

As a general rule, under statutes providing for summary proceedings against sheriffs and constables for official defaults, such a proceeding must be preceded by notice to the officer[46] or the issuance of process advising him of the proceedings against him,[47] which notice or process must be served on the officer the statutory length of time before the hearing or the granting of the rule or attachment sought.[48] Where notice is given to an officer that a motion for judgment against him for an official default will be made at a specified time, the motion must be made at the time appointed, or some other proceedings had to keep alive the notice, or it will lose its force.[49] An officer may, however, waive the requirement of notice[50] or objections founded on its irregularity.[51] Where an officer amends his return to a writ, after notice of a proceeding against him founded on the original return, a second notice is not necessary.[52]

Form, contents, and sufficiency. Where notice of a summary proceeding against a sheriff or constable is required, it must inform the officer to whom it is directed of the act or default on which his alleged liability is based[53] and of the remedy which it is sought to enforce against him.[54] Where the statute prescribes the form of process to be issued, such form must be adhered to,[55] and it has been held that the notice must contain all the requisites of a petition.[56] It has been held sufficient to specify the term at which the motion is to be made, without designating any particular day.[57] The notice of a motion against an officer for failure to return an execution need not require him to produce the execution,[58] nor is the validity of such a notice affected by the fact that it demands, as a legal conclusion, more or less by way of interest or damages than plaintiff is entitled to.[59] Where a rule nisi calls on a sheriff to make return of his actings and doings in the premises, and also to show cause why he should not be attached for a contempt, this is such a notice as to justify making the rule absolute and granting an attachment.[60] A notice is not invalidated by an error in the date.[61]

As a general rule summary proceedings against a sheriff or constable are properly instituted by, and in the name of, the person who is injured by his default.

As a general rule summary proceedings against a sheriff or constable are properly instituted by, and in the name of, the person who is injured by his default,[62] although it has been held that proceedings by attachment as for contempt should be in the name of the state.[63] There is authority for the rule that two or more persons having distinct interests may unite in a summary proceeding against an officer,[64] but the contrary has also been held.[65] The officer whose default forms the basis of the proceeding must be made a party thereto,[66] and a motion against "the sheriff of" a designated county, without mentioning his name, cannot be considered.[67] An applicant for a rule against an officer for the distribution of a fund in his hands need not in the first instance make other claimants of the fund parties to the proceeding,[68] but after the granting of the rule, on proper notice to such other claimants, either by the applicant or by the officer, they may, if they so desire, come in and be made parties.[69] Plaintiff's attorney is not a proper party to a motion against an officer for a failure to pay over money collected on execution because of the fact that he claims a lien on such money for the compensation for professional services and has notified the officer of such claim.[70] The permission of an execution plaintiff that a motion for statutory damages for the sheriff's failure to return an execution shall be carried on for the benefit of one of the defendants who was a mere surety for the others, but paid the amount, does not invest the surety with such a beneficial interest as requires that he be a party to the motion.[71] An officer who has been ruled for a failure to make the money due on an execution placed in his hands cannot convert the proceeding thus instituted against him into a rule against himself and a third person, not an official, by having the latter made a codefendant to the rule.[72] The sureties on the official bond of an officer are not necessary parties to summary proceedings against him for an official default.[73]

The rules relating to the sufficiency of the petition or moving papers in summary proceedings generally are applicable to summary proceedings against a sheriff or constable for an official default. Similarly, the sufficiency of the officer's answer is to be determined under the ordinary rules of pleading.

The rules relating to the sufficiency of the petition or moving papers in summary proceedings generally, considered in Summary Proceedings § 4, also 60 C.J. p 1015 note 22–p 1016 note 34, are applicable to summary proceedings against a sheriff or constable for an official default.[74] In some jurisdictions, where the proceeding is by motion, the notice of the motion serves as the initiatory pleading of the moving party,[75] and a written declaration is not necessary.[76] The officer may be permitted by the court to make answer at any time before the order or rule against him becomes absolute,[77] and the sufficiency of his answer is to be determined under the ordinary rules of pleading.[78] In proceedings by suggestion under a statute requiring the court to cause an issue to be made up to try the fact, a denial of the allegations of the suggestion presents an issue.[79] An omission to verify an answer or traverse is at most an amendable defect,[80] and in the absence of objection thereto the irregularity is deemed waived.[81] An answer is to be taken as true if not traversed,[82] and, therefore, when no traverse is taken, or a traverse filed is stricken, and the facts set out in the answer constitute a sufficient defense, the rule should be discharged or the proceedings dismissed.[83] It has been held that, in the absence of laches, a traverse may be filed at any time before the proceeding comes to trial.[84]

Issues; variance. Where a general denial is interposed in a summary proceeding against one as sheriff or constable for an official default, the question whether defendant is or is not such officer is in issue.[85] On scire facias against an officer to hold him as special bail, he having discharged defendant without taking bail, the objection that a capias ad satisfaciendum had not issued against defendant and been returned non est inventus, as required by statute, must be taken by special plea, and cannot be raised under the plea of nul tiel record.[86] Whether or not a variance between the execution described in a notice of motion against a sheriff or constable and that offered in evidence is fatal depends on the extent and materiality of the variance.[87] When a motion against a sheriff is based on an alias writ, a variance between the writ described in the notice and the one produced in evidence cannot be aided by the production of the original writ which corresponds with the notice.[88] A motion for a failure to return process cannot be sustained by proof of falsity or insufficiency of the return made.[89]

f. Evidence

General rules of evidence govern in summary proceedings against a sheriff or constable for an official default.

In summary proceedings against a sheriff or constable for an official default, general rules of evidence govern with respect to the matters necessary to be proved,[90] the presumptions which are to be indulged,[91] the burden of proof,[92] and the admissibility,[93] as well as the competency,[94] materiality,[95] and weight and sufficiency,[96] of the evidence.

Allegations held insufficient against demurrer

On a statutory motion to recover damages for failure to return execution on return day against former sheriff, and his successor, allegations that if former sheriff ever turned execution over to his successor, movants did not know when, or whether it was in person or by mail, that neither the execution nor notation on writ showed when successor sheriff received it, that movants did not have knowledge of facts, and that defendant sheriffs refused to give information, were insufficient as against demurrers, since presumption that former sheriff performed duty by delivering execution to successor was neutralized by presumption of equal dignity that successor would have performed his duty by making return at time required by law.—W T Rawleigh Co. v. g. Trial or Hearing

Issues of fact arising in summary proceedings against a sheriff or constable ordinarily are properly submitted to the jury, and questions of law are for the court

Issues of fact arising in summary proceedings against a sheriff or constable ordinarily are properly submitted to a jury[97] unless submitted to the court by agreement,[98] and questions of law are for the court.[99] The issue must be tried at the time at which the cause is called for trial unless good cause for a continuance is shown[1] It has been held that the trial must be by the court itself, and not by a referee[2] Where all the facts are admitted or not denied there is nothing to be submitted to a jury,[3] and where no evidence is introduced in support of a traverse of the answer of an officer on a rule against him it is proper for the court to dispose of the case on the facts set forth in the answer[4] Where the parties to summary proceedings appear and an issue is tried by a jury, the proceedings are like other suits in court commenced in the ordinary mode, and governed by the same rules,[5] with the single exception that it must appear affirmatively on the record that the court had jurisdiction to entertain the proceeding[6] Collateral questions cannot be considered.[7]

In a summary proceeding for a false or insufficient return, the inquiry is confined to the face of the return.[8] Where, in summary proceedings against an officer for failure to make the money on a writ, his sureties are not made parties, the fact of suretyship need not be found by the jury to sustain a judgment against them, but the proper course is to prove the fact of suretyship to the court.[9] A finding by the jury for plaintiff on the merits of a summary proceeding includes all the facts necessary to the ascertainment of defendant's liability, unless the statute requires the facts to be specially found.[10]

h. Judgment

Every fact which is necessary to give the court jurisdiction of summary proceedings against a sheriff or constable and to authorize the judgment must be set out in the judgment as having been made to appear.

Every fact which is necessary to give the court jurisdiction of summary proceedings against a sheriff or constable and to authorize the judgment must be set out in the judgment as having been made to appear[11] A motion against an officer charging him with failing to pay over money collected by him on execution, and also with failing to return the execution, will warrant a judgment against him for either of the causes alleged, although it be asked for only on one of these grounds.[12] In a proceeding against an officer for failure to return executions issued on two judgments against different parties for the same debt, the court will render but one judgment.[13] Whether or not claimants to a fund in the hands of an officer come in and cause themselves to be made parties to a summary proceeding against him for the distribution of such fund, they are bound by the judgment rendered if they actually participate in the hearing.[14] Where an officer neglects to take a bail bond, and in a proceeding had thereon against defendant and the officer the latter pleads, but defendant makes default, a verdict against the officer alone is proper, but the judgment should be against both him and defendant[15] A judgment commanding the officer to pay out of a fund in his hands plaintiff's claim and the costs of the proceeding, which, together, exceed the amount of such fund, is erroneous.[16] Where a judgment nisi is rendered against an officer for failure to return process and he shows no sufficient reason for such failure the judgment is properly made absolute.[17]

cumstances of the case as to whether it will attach a constable for contempt.[18]

Modification. After notice of appeal from an order, made in summary proceedings against an officer, directing an attachment to issue against him, the trial court may modify such order so as to meet the justice and law of the case.[19]

Setting aside. Where judgment directing the mode of disposition of funds in an officer's hands is rendered in summary proceedings to which all the claimants are parties, the officer cannot object to the mode of distribution so directed and has no standing to ask that the judgment be set aside.[20]

Judgment by default. No judgment by default can be rendered, nor can the averments of the moving party be taken as confessed, on the failure of an officer to appear or answer in summary proceedings against him, but the matters relied on to sustain his liability must be established by proof.[21]

i. Damages and Costs

Only such amount as is contemplated by statute may be recovered in summary proceedings against a sheriff or constable. Such an officer may be liable for the costs of the proceeding.

Only such amount as is contemplated by statute may be recovered in summary proceedings against a sheriff or constable.[22] Accordingly, where the proceeding is under a statute allowing a recovery of the amount of the debt or of the debt and damages, interest cannot be allowed, even though it might be recoverable in a common-law action.[23] Unless provided otherwise by statute, an execution plaintiff cannot recover from the sheriff more than the value of the execution defendant's property subject to levy;[24] and on a motion by a plaintiff in an execution against an officer for failure to return it in the proper time, when the amount of the execution has been paid to plaintiff by one of defendants after such default, plaintiff cannot recover the amount of the execution, but only the statutory damages for which the officer has rendered himself liable by his delinquency.[25] Where an officer's answer to a rule against him for money realized on a levy sets up expenses incurred by him in selling the property, and the like, and is not traversed, such expenses are properly allowed to him.[26]

In proceeding by officer against deputy. An officer against whom a judgment is rendered for the default or misconduct of his deputy cannot recover against such deputy, in summary proceedings, judgment for greater damages than have been recovered against himself,[27] except that in addition to the amount of such judgment he may recover his costs in defending the action in which it was rendered.[28]

Costs. A sheriff or constable may be liable for the costs of a summary proceeding against him for an official default.[29]

j. Review

An appeal lies from a final order or judgment against a sheriff or constable in summary proceedings, except where a statute provides otherwise.

An appeal lies from a final order or judgment against a sheriff or constable in summary proceedings, the same as from other final orders,[30] except where the statute relating to such proceedings provides otherwise, expressly or by clear implication.[31] A refusal to allow an officer to amend his return on an execution, pending a motion against him for neglect of duty in respect to the execution, cannot be assigned as error in the judgment on the motion.[32] An appellate court will not interfere with the discretion of the trial court in making absolute a rule against an officer, where his answer to the rule is evasive;[33] and a court has refused to disturb on appeal a rule absolute against an officer on his failure to make a sum of money on a mortgage execution on lands, although the trial court certified that by inadvertence execution was issued against the officer on the rule absolute, and also an attachment against him, whereas the statute authorizes only one of those remedies at a time.[34] Irregularities in the proceedings will not defeat them where a just result is reached.[35] A final order in a proceeding by rule against an officer is in the nature of a final judgment, on appeal from which the court may revise any intermediate order in the same proceeding involving the merits and necessarily affecting the judgment.[36] Where an error in a judgment is merely clerical, it will be amended by the appellate court and affirmed.[37] Defendant in an execution cannot except to, or appeal from, a judgment rendered in summary proceedings against an officer for failure to make the money on the execution.[38]

VIII. AMERCEMENT, FINES, AND PENALTIES

a General considerations
b. Construction and operation of statutes
c. Defaults for which amercement or penalization proper

a. General Considerations

Proceedings for the amercement of, or for the imposition of penalties on, sheriffs or constables for official defaults are purely statutory, and the courts will hold persons who claim the benefit of such statutes to a strict observance of the statutory requirements.

Some statutes provide for the amercement of sheriffs and constables, or for the imposition on them of prescribed fines and penalties, for various designated official defaults.[39] The liability to amercement or for a penalty for defaults is purely statutory,[40] and, in the absence of statute providing therefor, an officer is not subject to such liability.[41] The right to demand a judgment of amercement or for a penalty against a sheriff or constable rests on no equitable grounds,[42] and in the enforcement of a statutory penalty the courts will hold parties to a strict observance of the requirements of the statute,[43] and it is not permissible to invoke mere presumptions or inferences to support the imposition of a penalty.[44] It has been stated that certain statutes providing for amercement give a more expeditious remedy against sheriffs and other officers but give no additional rights, except, perhaps, with respect to the penalty provided for by the statutes.[45] A statutory proceeding for amercement is not the sole remedy against an officer who has been guilty of conversion.[46]

Under some statutes it has been held that the amercement of a sheriff or constable rests in the discretion of the court;[47] but by other authorities it has been held or recognized that when a case clearly within the statute is presented the court has no discretion but must render judgment of amercement.[48]

b. Construction and Operation of Statutes

Generally, statutes making provision for the amercement of, or for the imposition of penalties on, sheriffs or constables for official defaults are regarded as penal in nature, and, as such, are to be strictly construed and applied only to defaults clearly within their terms.

While a statute imposing a penalty on a sheriff or constable for an official default has been regarded as remedial rather than penal,[49] generally, statutes providing for the amercement of, or for the imposition of penalties on, sheriffs or constables for official defaults are regarded as penal in nature,[50] and, like other penal statutes, are to be strictly construed, and applied only to defaults clearly within their terms or purview.[51] So one who seeks to amerce or penalize an officer must bring himself within both the letter and the spirit of the law,[52] and very slight circumstances are sufficient to exempt the officer from the operation of the statute.[53] A statute imposing a certain penalty will not yield and give place exclusively to a later statute imposing a larger penalty unless there is such a clear repugnance between the statutes that both cannot stand;[54] but when the incongruity between two statutes is so great as to leave but little doubt that the legislature intended the later enactment to repeal the former it will be so construed.[55]

What constitutes "false return"

Making of "false return" within statute is conduct on part of officer which stigmatizes his representation of fact as dishonest one, and as calculated to deceive another by suppression of truth or nondisclosure of some material fact which should be revealed and return must be designedly untrue in order to subject sheriff and surety to penalty.—W. T Rawleigh Co. v. Brantley, 19 So 2d or an insufficient or improper[66] return, failure of the officer to indorse on an execution the date of its delivery to him,[67] failure to file an inventory when it was the officer's duty to do so,[68] delivering a chattel seized in replevin proceedings to either party without the consent of the other,[69] selling property without giving notice as required by statute,[70] failure to collect money which might have been collected by the use of reasonable diligence,[71] failure to pay over money actually collected,[72] failure to have the amount of sale on execution or the money so made before the court and to pay it over according to law,[73] misapplication or improper distribution of the proceeds of a sale,[74] serving a writ without having given bond,[75] levying on[76] or selling[77] exempt property, taking excessive fees,[78] discharging a prisoner arrested without taking him before a magistrate,[79] permitting a prisoner arrested under an execution against the person to escape,[80] refusal to give a prisoner a copy of the process under which he is detained,[81] delivering property under a writ of replevin before trying the validity of a claim interposed,[82] or failure to turn over to his successor all the books, furniture, etc., appertaining to his office.[83]

Default of deputy. A sheriff or constable may be amerced or penalized for a default of his deputy[84] unless under the statute the deputy himself is liable to amercement therefor.[85] A statute providing for the amercement of a sheriff or constable does not authorize the amercement of his deputy for the latter's defaults.[86] Where, however, the statute so provides, a deputy may be amerced for an official default.[87]

§ 174. Amount of Penalty or Amercement

The amount of amercement or of a penalty for which a sheriff or constable may be liable for an official default depends on the terms of the statute providing for the amercement or the penalty.

Since an amercement is, strictly speaking, a penalty, and so is properly for a fixed sum without regard to the extent of the injury suffered by the complaining party by reason of the default for which it is imposed,[88] a sheriff or constable may be liable, under some statutes so providing, for a penalty of a fixed amount prescribed by the statute[89] or of an amount not exceeding a fixed statutory limit.[90] Under other statutes, however, the amount of the penalty for an official default is fixed with respect to the injury resulting or which may be assumed to have resulted therefrom;[91] and so, under particular statutes, an officer may be liable for a prescribed multiple of the value of exempt property levied on,[92] or for the amount of the debt for the collection of which the process issued,[93] or for the amount of the actual loss sustained by plaintiff in the value or availability of his security by reason of the acts or omissions of the officer.[94] Under still other statutes, interest at a specified rate, sometimes exceeding the ordinary legal rate, on the amount for which the officer's default has made him liable may be imposed on an officer as a penalty,[95] or he may be liable for a multiple of the amount of lawful interest on the amount collected on a writ and not paid over.[96]

It has been held that not more than one fine can be legally imposed on an officer for failing to return one execution.[97] Some statutes prescribing a penalty of a specified amount for each day for failure of an officer to release an execution against exempt wages have been construed to provide for a separate penalty of the specified amount for each day while the release is wrongfully withheld.[98]

Discretion of court. Where discretion is reposed in the court as to the amount of the amercement or penalty to be imposed on a sheriff or constable for an official default, such discretion must be exercised reasonably and not arbitrarily, and the fine must not be excessive.[99]

b. Validity and regularity of judgment, process, or sale
c. Necessity of injury; collectability, payment, or satisfaction of debt or judgment

j. Miscellaneous matters

a. Duty to Act in General

In the absence of any duty of a sheriff or constable to act under the particular circumstances involved, he may not be amerced or held liable for a penalty for an alleged default.

A sheriff or constable may not be amerced or held liable for a penalty for an alleged default where he was not under a duty to act under the particular circumstances involved.[1] Accordingly, he cannot be amerced for not executing process where the circumstances are such that he is not bound to execute it.[2] A statute imposing a penalty on an officer neglecting a pay over on demand money collected on execution has been held to apply only where it is his plain duty to pay, and his neglect is willful, and not where the right of plaintiff to the payment is doubtful.[3] Similarly, where a writ is delivered to an officer other than one of those to whom under the statute it should be directed, he is not liable to a statutory penalty for failure to return it.[4] An officer cannot be amerced for failing to file an inventory before it becomes his duty to file it.[5] for an alleged default with respect to the execution or return of a writ of execution, there must be a valid and enforceable judgment and a writ conforming to such judgment, and such officer may not be subjected to a penalty for a sale of property without due notice, where the sale is void because it is made under an invalid statute or where the sale is made under void process.

Where an execution plaintiff seeks to amerce a sheriff or constable for a default with respect to the execution or return of his writ he must show a valid and enforceable judgment[6] and an execution conforming strictly to such judgment.[7] Where an execution is null and void, an officer cannot be amerced for neglecting or refusing to make a return thereon;[8] and an officer may not be subjected to a charge in the nature of a penalty for failure to levy execution, where the writ of execution is so irregular because of noncompliance with statutory requirements that the officer is not required to make the levy.[9] It has been held, however, that the judgment must be void in order to avail the officer of relief from his liability for failure to return execution, in view of the fact that his attack on the judgment is a collateral one,[10] and that the fact that the judgment on which execution was issued was set aside as to some of the judgment defendants while the officer held the execution does not necessarily relieve the officer from liability for failure to make a return in due time.[11]

Where, by mistake of the clerk, certain costs are erroneously taxed and indorsed on an execution, the officer, after selling land under it, cannot be amerced for failing to pay over to the execution creditor the amount of such costs.[12]

Sale. A sheriff or constable does not incur a penalty provided by law for selling property without the required notice, if the sale is void in consequence of the unconstitutionality of the law under which it was made[13] or if the process under which the sale is made is void.[14] The fact that property levied on by a sheriff or constable is bid in by or for a prohibited person does not render the proceeding any the less a sale, so as to exempt the officer from the penalty for making a sale contrary to statutory provisions.[15]

c. Necessity of Injury; Collectability, Payment, or Satisfaction of Debt or Judgment

(1) In General

Under some, but not under all, statutes, a sheriff or constable may be amerced or held liable for a penalty, notwithstanding the complaining party was not injured by the default in question.

A sheriff or constable cannot avoid amercement or the imposition of a penalty, under some statutes, for a failure to serve, execute, or return process by showing that the party at whose instance the process issued was not injured by his default[16] The rule does not apply, however, where the statute provides otherwise, either expressly or by implication.[17] Furthermore, there is authority for the view that, under some statutes, injury must be shown, even in the absence of provision to that effect.[18]

Escape. It has been held that immediate retaking and imprisonment of a debtor can be pleaded in bar of a suit for the penalty for his negligent escape, where the complaining party has not been prejudiced.[19]

(2) Whether or Not Debt or Judgment Collectable

The view has been taken that an absolute liability imposed by statute on a sheriff or constable for an official default may be enforced, even though the debt involved could not have been collected if there had not been a default; but it has been held or recognized, under some statutes, that such an officer may not be amerced for various defaults involving writs of execution, if there was no property of the judgment debtor out of the proceeds of which the claim covered by the writ could have been paid.

According to some authority, where a statute imposes on a sheriff or constable who is guilty of an official default in connection with the execution or return of process an absolute liability for the amount of debt, such liability cannot be reduced by showing that the debt could not have been collected even though there had been no default,[20] but it has been held or recognized that the mere fact that the officer does not collect the amount of an execution cannot subject him to amercement or to a penalty where it appears that the debtor had no property out of which the amount or any part thereof could have been made,[21] that it is a complete defense to a proceeding to amerce, or to impose a penalty on, an officer for failure duly to return an execution that the debtor had no property subject to execution during the life of the writ, and hence that the judgment creditor was not injured,[22] and that an officer cannot be amerced for failure to sell property attached or levied on where it appears that at the time of the levy the property was subject to a chattel mortgage for its full value[23] or was inadequate to pay more than the amount of a senior writ already levied thereon.[24] The mere fact, however, that there are prior liens on the property of defendant in execution does not relieve the officer of liability for failure to levy execution.[25]

It has been held or recognized that the mere insolvency of the judgment debtor does not necessarily relieve the officer of liability for failure to levy execution[26] or to return execution,[27] but it has also been held that the officer cannot be held liable for failure to levy on property or to make due return of execution, where nothing could have been realized because of the filing of a voluntary petition in bankruptcy by the defendant in execution,[28] and that the fact that the officer did not make a levy under, or due return of, an execution is not ground for amercement, where, at the time of the motion to amerce, enforcement of the judgment was barred by the discharge of the judgment debtor in bankruptcy proceeding.[29]

(3) Payment or Satisfaction of Debt or Judgment; Tender

Exempt or nonexempt property

(1) The rule stated in the text applies whether or not the property involved is exempt property—Flowers v. Gray, supra.

(2) In an amercement proceeding in which the judgment involved was based on a work and labor claim, where it appeared that the enforcement of judgment was barred by reason of discharge of judgment debtor in bankruptcy, contention that, since judgment debtor made no appearance in state court since judgment was rendered against him, and that at no time could he have asserted that his exempt property could not be taken in execution and, sheriff could not raise such question was erroneous—Flowers v. Gray, supra.

date, there is authority for the view that the amercement of such an officer for failure to levy an execution may properly be denied where the debt or judgment for the collection or enforcement of which the execution was issued has been satisfied.

Under some statutes a penalty for the failure of a sheriff or constable to return a writ may be imposed notwithstanding the payment of the debt after the return day,[30] and, where an officer fails to return an execution within the proper time and a defendant surety pays the amount thereof to plaintiff, the latter does not lose his right to recover the penalty imposed by statute on the officer for his failure by allowing the motion against the officer for such penalty to be carried on for the benefit of the surety.[31] The view has been taken, however, that the amercement of an officer for failure to levy an execution is properly denied where it appears that the debt or judgment for the collection or enforcement of which the execution issued has been in fact satisfied,[32] especially where it further appears that the judgment has been duly canceled or an entry of satisfaction has been made by plaintiff,[33] and that the acceptance by plaintiff of the amount collected by an officer on an execution absolves such officer from amercement for failing to return such execution.[34] It seems that an officer may escape a fine for a false return, in not returning property attached and sold as perishable, by showing that the proceeds were paid to the attachment plaintiff.[35] A tender of the amount due on a writ, if not accepted, does not discharge the officer from liability for a penalty for failing to make a return.[36]

d. Receipt or Nonreceipt of Money by Officer

A sheriff or constable is not subject to amercement for a failure to pay over the proceeds of property which has properly been sold on credit under a writ, where the purchase price has not been paid to him, or he has received a check or note which has not been paid, but his liability for a penalty for making a sale without authority or for selling property which is not subject to sale is not affected by the fact that he has not received the purchase price.

A sheriff or constable who has sold property under a writ cannot be amerced for failure to pay over the proceeds where the property was properly sold on a credit and the purchase money has not been paid to him,[37] or where he has received only a check[38] or note[39] which has not been paid. The fact, however, that a sale was on credit and that the officer has received no money does not affect his liability for a penalty for making a sale without authority or selling property not subject to be sold.[40]

Return showing receipt of money. It has been held that a penalty imposed by statute on sheriffs and constables for a failure to pay over money is recoverable only when by his return the officer has admitted the collection of money, and refuses to pay it over, and not where he has returned nulla bona,[41] but there is also authority, to the contrary, that a return admitting the receipt of money is not a condition precedent to the imposition of a penalty, and that the fact that the money has been received by the officer may be established by other evidence.[42]

e. Conflicting Claims or Proceedings

Under some, but not under all, circumstances, a sheriff or constable is not subject to amercement or to the imposition of a penalty for failure to pay over the proceeds of property or to levy on, or to sell, property under a writ of execution, where there are conflicting claims or proceedings with respect to such proceeds or property.

Generally a statutory penalty for the failure of a sheriff or constable to pay over money is not recoverable where the failure is caused by the fact that there are conflicting claims to such money which the officer cannot determine and which have not been determined by the courts,[43] and it has been held that, where a sheriff or constable who has collected money on execution is notified not to pay it over to plaintiff, and a motion for that purpose is made in court, the officer is not liable to a penalty for not paying the money to plaintiff until the decision of such motion.[44] A sheriff or constable who has been enjoined from paying over money cannot be amerced for his failure to make such payment.[45]

45. Ohio.—Langdon v. Summers, 10 Ohio St. 77.

Attachment of money in officer's hands. Where an execution commands a sheriff or constable to make the money, and have it before the court on the return day to satisfy plaintiff, he cannot protect himself against a motion to amerce for failure to have the money by showing that a foreign attachment has been served on him,[46] nor can an officer who has received satisfaction of an execution escape liability for failure to pay over the money on the ground that by direction of the debtor he has attached it on a writ in favor of the debtor against the creditor.[47]

Claim of exemption. An officer cannot be amerced for failure to levy on and sell the property of a judgment debtor under a writ of execution, where such debtor had given timely notice that the property on which levy was contemplated was his homestead.[48]

Claim of third person to property. The fact that property found in the possession of a defendant in execution and levied on by a sheriff or constable is claimed by a third person will not prevent the amercement of the officer for refusing to sell the property at the request of plaintiff, where he asks no indemnity of plaintiff, and takes no measure to secure himself against such claim;[49] but where, on an adverse claim to property levied on being made, the officer asks for instructions from plaintiff's attorneys, which are promised him, he is not liable to amercement for not selling until he has disobeyed or disregarded positive, reasonable, and lawful directions to that end.[50]

Proceedings for appointment of receiver. It has been held that an officer is not subject to amercement for failure to complete an execution, where such failure results from his belief in good faith that an application for the appointment of a receiver of the property of the judgment debtor abated the execution process in his hands.[51]

f. Innocent Mistake

While it has been held that a sheriff or constable may be subject to a penalty for making a return which is false in fact, notwithstanding the return was made as the result of an innocent mistake, it has also been held or recognized that such an officer may not be amerced or penalized for various alleged defaults which resulted from such a mistake.

There is authority for the view that a return of process made by a sheriff or constable which is false in fact will subject him to the penalty for a false return, even though it was made through mistake, without any criminal intent.[52] It has, however, been held that an officer is not liable to amercement for applying money collected in satisfaction of the wrong execution, where he was not influenced by corrupt or personal motives,[53] or for a mistake in the application of money, without gross carelessness, and where none of the money is in the officer's hands,[54] and that an officer who, acting in good faith and with the intention of returning a writ, by mistake mails it to the wrong person is not liable to the penalty prescribed for failure to return process.[55]

g. Illness or Incapacity of Officer

The physical disability of a sheriff or constable to perform the duties of his office does not prevent his amercement for failure to make a return in due time, if, at the pertinent time, he had a deputy.

While there is apparent authority for the view that the fact that the failure of an officer to return an execution at the proper time has been caused by his illness may relieve him from a statutory penalty for the default,[56] it has been held that the physical disability of the officer to perform the duties of his office does not excuse failure to make a return in due time so as to prevent amercement, where such officer was, at the pertinent time, provided with a deputy.[57]

h. Termination of Incumbency of Office

A sheriff or constable may be amerced, after his incumbency of office has terminated, for an official default which occurred during incumbency; but he may not be amerced for failure to return a writ if he had not commenced to execute such writ and his incumbency terminated before the return day.

A sheriff or constable who is guilty of an official default while in office may be amerced therefor after his incumbency has terminated by expiration of his term or otherwise;[58] but where an officer who has not commenced to execute a writ goes out of office before the return day he is not subject to amercement or to a penalty for failure to return it.[59]

i. Acts, Omissions, or Status of Complaining Party

(1) In general
(2) Necessity and sufficiency of demand
(3) Ratification or waiver

(1) In General

Generally a sheriff or constable may not be amerced for an alleged official default which resulted from, or was induced by, acts or omissions of the complaining party.

As a general rule, a sheriff or constable is not subject to amercement or to the imposition of a penalty for an act or omission to which the complaining party has consented,[60] or to which an act of such party contributed directly or indirectly,[61] or for an act or omission constituting the alleged default which was in accordance with such party's instructions or was induced by him,[62] or for an improper act or course of proceeding where the impropriety thereof resulted from facts within the knowledge of such party but not of the officer and of the existence of which he was not notified.[63] So also, a sheriff or constable will not be amerced where the interference of the complaining party has prevented him from discharging his duty.[64] A sheriff or constable cannot be amerced for failure to pay over money to a person of whose rights he had no notice.[65] It has been held, however, that directions or instructions by plaintiff in a writ to a sheriff or constable not to proceed with the collection of the debt or the execution of the writ do not justify the officer in failing to return the writ, and that he may accordingly be amerced for such failure.[66]

Failure to furnish indemnity. When a sheriff or constable is entitled to indemnity before proceeding further in the execution of process, and has demanded it, he cannot be amerced for not proceeding if the indemnity is not furnished.[67] It has been held that, regardless of the propriety of the officer's demand for a bond, the complaining party loses his right to charge such officer with a penalty for failing to return an execution, by accepting the writ from the officer and thus preventing the latter from correcting his mistake, if any,[68] and that the judgment creditor's failure to reply to, or to act on, the sheriff's demand for indemnity before levying execution may excuse the sheriff's failure to make a due return.[69]

Issuance of second or subsequent writ. A sheriff or constable is not relieved from the penalty for failure to return an execution at the proper time by the fact that an alias execution has been issued on which he has collected the money;[70] but where plaintiff, with knowledge of the facts, issues process which is necessarily dependent on, and subsequent to, former process which has been improperly executed or irregularly returned, he thereby loses the right to amerce the officer for the default.[71]

Fraudulent or insufficient claim of exemption. A sheriff or constable cannot be subjected to a statutory penalty for levying on exempt property where the claim of exemption is fraudulent.[72] Similarly, where a debtor is entitled to select property up to the amount of his exemption, provided he turns over all the remainder of his property to be levied on, he cannot recover a statutory penalty for levying on property selected by him as exempt where he has not so offered to turn over the balance of his property.[73]

Residence of complainant. A debtor is not precluded from recovering the statutory penalty from Failure to levy

A former sheriff may be held liable, under some statutes, for failure to execute an order of sale during his incumbency of office, notwithstanding such incumbency terminated before the return day of such order—Blanscet v. Palo Duro Furniture Co, Tex.Civ.App, 68 S.W 2d 527.

a sheriff or constable for selling on execution property exempt under the law by the fact that he lives in a county other than that in which the levy on his property was made.[74]

(2) Necessity and Sufficiency of Demand

Under some statutes a demand is essential in order to render a sheriff or constable liable for a penalty for failure to pay over money, but, in the absence of a statutory provision requiring demand, a demand is not essential to authorize amercement for failure to return process.

Under some statutes a demand on a sheriff or constable is necessary to render him liable to a penalty for failure to pay over money[75] or for failure to give to a person arrested a copy of the process under which he is detained,[76] and, where the penalty is in the form of interest, such interest on money collected can be computed only from the time of the demand made.[77] In the absence of a statutory requirement of demand, no demand is necessary in order to justify amercement for failure to return process.[78] Under some statutes a demand for a copy of process must be made by or in behalf of the person held or detained under it,[79] and a demand for money must be made by a person having authority to receive such money and to execute a legal and valid discharge to the officer.[80] The institution of a suit against an officer for money collected by him is a demand therefor.[81] A demand for an amount greater than that claimed in a suit therefor, and much greater than that found due by the court, is not sufficient to justify the court in imposing a penalty for failure to pay over money.[82]

(3) Ratification or Waiver

An execution plaintiff who has ratified acts with respect to the writ or has waived a default of a sheriff or constable may not thereafter obtain amercement for such acts or default.

An execution plaintiff who has ratified the acts of a sheriff or constable with respect to the writ[83] or waived a default of a sheriff or constable[84] cannot subsequently procure his amercement because of such acts or default.

j. Miscellaneous Matters

Various other matters or circumstances have been regarded as sufficient to prevent, or as insufficient to authorize, amercement of, or penalizing, a sheriff or constable for an alleged default.

Where a sheriff or constable deposits a duly executed return of process in the United States mails, in a cover properly addressed to the clerk of the court to which such process is returnable, in time to reach such clerk in ordinary course on the return-day, the failure of such return to reach the addressee until after the return-day does not subject the officer to amercement for failing to make return at the proper time.[85] A statute imposing a penalty on a sheriff or constable for the seizure of exempt property has been held not to apply to a mere seizure, in the absence of some act equivalent to a conversion of the property,[86] so that an officer cannot be amerced where, on demand, he returns, or tenders the return of, property so seized.[87] It has been held that an officer is not liable for a penalty for having served a writ without having given a bond, where a bond which was binding on the obligors had actually been given, although the public officials who approved the bond signed in the wrong place[88] or although changes were made in the signatures after the writ was served.[89] In view of the fact that a statute imposing a penalty on an officer for taking excessive fees is to protect the public from official extortion, it does not apply to a voluntary payment.[90] A statute providing for the imposition of a fine on a sheriff or constable for a palpable omission of duty or for willful or corrupt malfeasance or partiality in the discharge of his official duties has been held not to apply to an act as to the propriety of which differences of opinion honestly exist.[91] Under a statute providing that a sheriff or constable against whom a judgment is rendered for a delinquency shall forfeit and pay a prescribed sum, to be recovered at the same time for the use of the county, the judgment for the penalty is only an incident to the principal judgment against the officer, and, on reversal of the latter judgment, the judgment for

i. Review

a. In General

The mode of proceeding prescribed by a statute providing for amercement must be pursued in order to obtain the amercement of a sheriff or constable for an official default.

No mode of proceeding to procure the amercement of a sheriff or constable for an official default may be pursued other than that prescribed by the statutes providing for such amercement.[94] Ordinarily it is proper to proceed summarily, as by notice or motion,[95] but a penalty based on the amount of plaintiff's loss or damage has been said to be recoverable by action,[96] although it has also been held that penalties prescribed by statute for failure of a sheriff or other officer to do certain acts cannot be inflicted in an independent action.[97]

Pendency of civil action. It has been held that a summary proceeding for the amercement of a sheriff or constable cannot be instituted during the pendency of a civil action brought by complainant against the officer in which all the matters relating to the default will be inquired into and every object attained for which the summary proceeding was intended.[98]

Who may proceed to enforce liability. Under a statute providing that the party aggrieved by the default of an officer may proceed for amercement, a purchaser at an execution sale is not a party aggrieved within a statute imposing a penalty on an officer for selling real property without notice,[99] and some statutes do not authorize a proceeding to enforce liability for failure to make a return to be brought by an execution debtor[1] or by defendant in replevin.[2] Where, on a sale under a decree in foreclosure, the price obtained is sufficient only to pay the prior liens, the holder of a subsequent lien has no claim against the officer for amercement.[3]

b. Jurisdiction and Time for Proceeding

Except as provided otherwise by statute, jurisdiction of a proceeding to amerce a sheriff or constable is vested in the court from which the writ involved in the alleged default issued. Such a proceeding must be brought within the time prescribed by statute.

Except as provided otherwise by statute,[4] the jurisdiction of a proceeding for the amercement of a sheriff or constable belongs to the court out of which issued the process in respect of which occurred the default on which the proceeding is founded.[5]

Where the time within which proceedings to amerce a sheriff or constable is to be brought is prescribed by statute, a proceeding not brought within such time is barred,[6] but, in the absence of any statute of limitations applying in terms to amercement proceedings, it has been held that an officer's liability to amercement continues indefinitely, or at least until the lapse of such time as would raise a presumption of payment.[7] Under a statute imposing a separate penalty of a separate amount for each day the officer fails to release an execution against exempt wages, it has been held, with respect to the running of limitations, that a right of action for each separate penalty accrues each day while the release is wrongfully withheld.[8] It is not necessary that a proceeding founded on failure to return process shall be at the term to which the process is returnable, but it may be at a subsequent term;[9] and an officer who fails to sell property levied on may be amerced at a term after that to which the execution is returnable.[10]

c. Notice or Process

A sheriff or constable should be given due notice of a proceeding for his amercement.

A sheriff or constable is entitled to notice of proceedings for his amercement[11] for such time as may be prescribed by statute,[12] and a judgment of amercement is without validity where proper notice has not been given or process served[13] unless the want of notice or process has been waived.[14] A notice of a motion to amerce to be made on a day specified, which is a legal holiday, "or as soon thereafter as the court can attend to the same," has been held a good notice for the day succeeding the one designated.[15] A notice of an amercement proceeding is operative from the time of service,[16] and has been held good without a date[17] or with an impossible date.[18] Any irregularity in a notice is waived by the taking of testimony under the notice and the adjournment of the hearing without objection.[19] Unless provided otherwise by statute, such notice must be served personally on the officer,[20] and proof of mailing it to him is not sufficient.[21]

Who are proper or necessary parties to a proceeding to amerce, or to impose a penalty on, a sheriff or constable depends largely on the terms of the statute providing for the proceeding.

A proceeding to amerce a sheriff or constable for a false return on a writ in which two persons are plaintiffs may be instituted by such plaintiffs jointly,[22] and a proceeding for a penalty for making deliverance of property under a writ of replevin before trying the validity of a claim interposed must be brought in the names of all those making the claim.[23] It has been held that an action to recover from an officer the penalty for neglecting to note on process the day of receiving it must be brought in the name of the state,[24] and an action against an outgoing officer for a statutory penalty for refusal to turn over to his successor all the books, furniture, etc., appertaining to the office must be brought by and for the state, and not by or for any private person, or through the means of a qui tam action.[25] The makers of a bond indemnifying an officer from the consequences of paying out an execution fund to them are entitled to contest the right of plaintiffs, who claim the fund, to recover the statutory penalty from such officer for failure to pay over the fund to them.[26] In an action to recover a penalty for levying on exempt property, under a statute giving such penalty only against the officer, plaintiff in the execution cannot be made a party.[27]

e. Pleading

Under some statutes pleadings are not required in a proceeding to amerce a sheriff or constable for an official default, but it has been held or recognized, where something in the nature of a declaration or complaint is essential, that the complaining party must allege a default within the terms of the statute or facts showing liability.

Under some statutes no pleadings are necessary in a proceeding to amerce a sheriff or constable for an official default.[28] Where, however, the notice takes the place and performs the office of the declaration in an action at common law, it must set out the cause of complaint with the same certainty, although not necessarily with the same formality, as would be required in a declaration,[29] and must set forth a default within the terms of the statute providing for amercement.[30] It has been held or recognized that, where a petition or moving papers are necessary, they must set forth facts showing the liability of the officer,[31] and it has been held that the statute under which a penalty is sought to be recovered must be specially pleaded,[32] but there is also authority, to the contrary, that a pleading is sufficient without referring to the statute where it alleges facts rendering the officer liable and prays judgment for an amount equivalent to the statutory penalty.[33] Some statutes do not require the complaining party to make an allegation of damages sustained.[34] The officer may properly set forth, by plea, the facts on which he relies as a defense,[35] and under some statutes he must allege matters relied on to relieve him of liability for an apparent default.[36] Where the statute contemplates summary proceedings rather than a civil action, a summons and complaint in an action to recover the statutory penalty cannot be treated as a motion in the original cause where that is pending in a different court.[37]

Issues, proof, and variance. Under some statutes it is not essential to make up formal issues in a proceeding for amercement.[38] Where payment of the debt is a defense to a proceeding for the amercement of a sheriff or constable, or relieves him from liability, it seems that evidence of such payment before the institution of the proceeding is admissible without a special plea of the fact,[39] and that evidence of payment after the proceeding was instituted is admissible where properly pleaded.[40] Some statutes do not require proof of damages sustained by the complaining party,[41] and such party need not prove facts which are admitted by defendant officer's pleading.[42] Any but the slightest variance between the notice of a motion to amerce and the motion itself is fatal.[43]

Waiver of objection. Plaintiff in a proceeding to amerce an officer waives his right, if any, to base an objection on the failure of defendant officer to plead, in such officer's response to the motion to amerce, a particular defense, by proceeding to the trial of the case without objection, as though the defense had been pleaded,[44] or, for example, by failure to object to the admission of evidence in support of the defense.[45]

f. Evidence

Subject to some qualifications based on the nature of the proceeding, general rules as to evidence apply in a proceeding to amerce, or to impose a penalty on, a sheriff or constable for an official default.

In proceedings to amerce, or to subject to a penalty, a sheriff or constable for an official default, the complaining party must prove affirmatively every essential element of his right to recover.[46] While it has been held, under some statutes, that the complaining party has the burden to show that he has been damaged by the alleged default,[47] where the complaining party has established a prima facie case against the officer under the statute, the latter has the burden to prove facts relied on to relieve him of liability,[48] as, for example, that no injury was sustained by the complaining party[49] because nothing could have been collected under an execution.[50]

Admissibility. Whether or not particular evidence is admissible depends generally on the relevancy and materiality of such evidence with respect to the issues involved.[51]

Weight and sufficiency. In proceedings to amerce, or to impose a penalty on, a sheriff or constable for an official default, the complaining party is held to strict or clear and convincing proof of the alleged delinquency,[52] and must overcome the presumption in favor of the propriety of the officer's official conduct by at least a preponderance of proof.[53] If the evidence leaves the propriety of amercing the officer in doubt, no judgment should be rendered against him.[54] One moving to amerce an officer for neglecting to levy a fieri facias need not show the precise value of the property on which levy might have been made, but it is sufficient to show that the neglect has deprived him of a substantial benefit under his writ.[55] Proof of failure of the officer to perform an act within the purview of the statute makes out a prima facie case of liability under some statutes.[56] Likewise, proof that a writ was directed by the clerk to a sheriff of another county, and mailed in due time to reach him in the regular course of the mail, is sufficient evidence that the writ came to his hands to authorize the entering of a judgment nisi for an amercement for failure to return it.[57] In an action for a penalty for selling property without notice, the officer's return is only prima facie evidence in his favor[58] and may be overcome by slight evidence aliunde,[59] and when, in the face of positive testimony that subsequent to making the return he has admitted its falsity, the officer offers neither denial nor explanation of such admissions, the effect of the return as evidence in his favor is completely overcome.[60]

g. Trial or Hearing

Unless the statute provides otherwise, general rules with respect to trial of an action apply to a proceeding to amerce, or to impose a penalty on, a sheriff or constable for an official default.

Under some statutes a motion for the amercement of a sheriff or constable must be made in open court,[61] and the mere filing of a written motion in the clerk's office in vacation is not effective.[62] On scire facias against an officer, issued on an amercement nisi, for not returning a writ, to which the officer appears and pleads, plaintiff is entitled to a trial at the return term of the scire facias.[63] Although statutes providing for summary proceedings without a jury against sheriffs and constables for failure to return or levy execution or pay over money collected have been held valid, as discussed in Juries § 73, in proceedings founded on a failure to make due return of an execution the question whether it was made in proper time has been held to be a question of fact to be decided by a jury.[64] In amercement proceedings in a supreme or other appellate court which has no power to call a jury,

51. Evidence held admissible

(1) In a proceeding to amerce an officer for failure to sell property, where such officer's return recited that the property had been sold by the complaining party, evidence as to the circumstances of such sale was admissible on behalf of such officer both as explanatory of the return and on the issue whether or not such officer had neglected or refused to sell the property without just cause.—Riffel v. Konecny, 88 P. 2d 1077, 149 Kan. 533.

(2) Such evidence was not vitiated by the refusal of the trial court to admit in evidence an amended return.—Riffel v. Konecny, supra.

Evidence held not admissible issues of fact must be tried on affidavits [65] Where the trial is to a jury, under a statute by which the penalty is fixed as a multiple of plaintiff's damages or loss, the verdict may be either for the full amount of such penalty[66] or the jury may return the amount of the damages and the court may enter judgment for the proper multiple thereof;[67] but where the jury has been instructed that plaintiff is entitled to recover a multiple of the damages it cannot be assumed that a verdict represents merely the damages and not the penalty.[68]

h. Judgment or Order

In a summary proceeding for the amercement of a sheriff or constable, the judgment or order of amercement should set forth the facts necessary to give the court jurisdiction and should show that the moving party was entitled to make the motion. An order of amercement has the force and effect of a judgment.

Where proceedings for the amercement of a sheriff or constable are summary, the judgment or order of amercement must set forth the facts necessary to give the court jurisdiction[69] and make it appear that the moving party was entitled to make the motion.[70] An order of amercement has the force and effect of a judgment.[71]

Judgment nisi. Under a statute subjecting a sheriff or constable to a stated penalty for an official default, to be paid on motion and proof of the default unless the officer can show sufficient cause, a judgment nisi should be rendered against him for the amount of the penalty,[72] which judgment is subsequently to be made absolute if no sufficient justification or excuse for the default is shown.[73]

Setting aside judgment or order. Where a judgment of amercement has been improperly entered, it may be set aside,[74] provided application therefor is made in due time [75] Where a plaintiff in an execution files a motion to compel the officer to pay over money collected under execution, and for a penalty for failing to pay on the return-day, and the motion is overruled, and plaintiff receives the principal sum, he cannot then have the judgment overruling the motion set aside and proceed for the penalty.[76]

i. Review

A petition in error has been held to be the proper method to obtain the review of an order for the amercement of a sheriff or constable

The proper mode of reviewing an order for the amercement of a sheriff or constable has been held to be by petition in error [77] An order setting aside an amercement is not reviewable on writ of error or certiorari [78]

IX. LIABILITIES ON OFFICIAL BONDS

§ 177. In General

The official bond of a sheriff or constable binds him no further than he would be liable without it. It goes with him in all of his official acts, and the statute authorizing or requiring the bond to be given controls in determining the liability thereon.

An official bond of a sheriff or constable binds him no further than he would be liable without it,[79] and no official act can be considered a breach of the condition of the bond faithfully to execute the duties of the office unless it would, without bond, amount to a breach of official duty.[80] The bond goes with the officer in all of his official acts,[81] and the statutes authorizing or requiring the bond to be given control in determining liability thereon,[82] although provisions of other statutes governing the official conduct of the sheriff will not be ignored.[83] Substantial compliance with a directory statute relative to required provisions of an official bond binds the surety.[84] The bond is governed by the statutes of the state in which the bond was given.[85]

What bonds official. In general, any bond required by law to be given by a sheriff or constable to assure the proper performance of his official duties is to be regarded as an official bond.[86]

Persons protected by bond Even though the obligee named in an official bond of a sheriff or constable is the state or a designated public officer, the bond inures to the benefit of individuals who are injured by a default of the obligor,[87] and the nominal obligee is a mere trustee of the bond for those who are injured by breaches of the condition thereof.[88] A bond of a deputy sheriff or constable, however, in which such deputy's principal is named as obligee, is, under some statutes, for the officer's protection only and does not inure to the benefit of persons damaged by the deputy's defaults;[89] but under other statutes it protects all persons who may be injured by a violation of its terms [90]

Where the office of sheriff or constable has no legal existence, or where the appointment of such an officer is void, the sureties on his official bond are not liable thereon, but the failure of one entering on the duties of sheriff or constable to take the oath of office does not defeat the liability of the sureties on his official bond

Where the office of sheriff or constable is not provided for by law and has no legal existence, a bond given by one assuming to hold such office and intended as an official bond imposes no liability on the sureties thereon [91] Likewise, where the appointment of a sheriff or constable is void for lack of authority in the appointing officer to make the appointment, an official bond given by the person so attempted to be appointed is also void and imposes no liability on the sureties,[92] but the sureties are nevertheless liable for his official acts or defaults while he is actually holding the office or acting as such officer, where the appointment or election of a sheriff or constable and his induction into office are objectionable only because of his ineligibility to the office,[93] or because of irregularities or informalities in the appointment or election.[94] Where one duly elected or appointed a sheriff or constable has duly entered on his duties and assumed to act as such, the sureties on his official bond cannot escape liability for his acts or defaults on the ground that he never took the oath of office prescribed by law.[95]

Estoppel of sureties to deny official character of principal. The execution of the official bond of a sheriff or constable estops the sureties to deny the official character of their principal.[96]

b. Liability as Limited by Terms of Bond

The contract of the sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable is strictissimi juris and the principal or the sureties on such bond cannot be held liable unless there is a breach of the conditions of the bond; nor can their liability be extended by implication or construction.

The contract of the sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable is strictissimi juris;[97] they stand on the letter of the bond, and are bound no further than the letter goes,[98] and cannot be held liable for a default not fairly covered by the condition of the bond.[99] So the principal[1] or the sureties[2] cannot be held liable unless there is a breach of the conditions of the bond; nor can their liability be extended by implication or construction.[3] In order for there to be a breach of the conditions of the bond the sheriff or his deputy must be guilty of misfeasance, malfeasance, or nonfeasance.[4] The strict interpretation of sureties' liability on fidelity bonds, however, has been modified by recent decisions with the change from personal to commercial sureties.[5]

In determining the liability of the sureties on a bond its terms are to be given their reasonable meaning, considered with respect to the purposes contemplated by the statute requiring the bond;[6] and such a bond cannot be construed so as to operate as a policy of insurance in favor of the traveling public against damage in an automobile collision.[7] Where the bond contains a condition not authorized, or illegal, such condition may, unless the statute makes the bond void in consequence thereof, be disregarded and the bond enforced as though it were not present.[8] A bond executed by a deputy sheriff to his principal for the performance of "all the duties required of him as deputy sheriff" embraces all the duties which by law devolve on the sheriff.[9] A bond executed by the sureties and delivered to the officer before the expiration of his term cannot be held as a matter of law to relate to and cover a new term to which the officer is appointed or elected to succeed himself, where the language of the bond would apply to either term.[10]

c. Liability as between Sureties on Different Bonds

(1) Successive bonds
(2) General and special bonds
(3) Bonds given in different capacities

(1) Successive Bonds

The general rule, subject to some qualifications and exceptions, is that, where a sheriff or constable gives two or more successive bonds, the liability for a default falls on the sureties on the bond which was in force when the default occurred, and that a new or renewal bond does not cover any defaults which occurred before its execution unless an intention to the contrary appears.

It is a general rule that, where a sheriff or constable gives two or more successive bonds, the liability for a default falls on the sureties on the bond which was in force when the default occurred,[11] and that a new or renewal bond does not cover any defaults which occurred before its execution,[12] unless an intention to the contrary appears.[13] It has, however, been held that as soon as process is delivered to an officer it attaches itself, in contemplation of law, to the bond which is then in force and which gives him authority to act at that time, and that such bond, rather than a subsequent bond, must respond for any default in connection with such writ.[14] Where a new bond does not supersede the older one, the sureties on both bonds are bound as cosureties for any future default or misfeasance of the officer.[15]

Where officer serves successive terms. Where a sheriff or constable serves two or more successive terms, the liability for a default by him falls on the sureties on his official bond for the term in which such default occurs.[16] Thus, where process is delivered to an officer during one term of his office, but he does not commence to execute it until he has entered on a new term with new sureties, such new sureties are liable for any defaults with respect to the execution of such process,[17] and the old sureties cannot be held therefor,[18] except where the statute makes it the duty of an officer receiving process to execute it, even though his term expires before the return day, in which case the sureties on the old bond are liable for his defaults in respect thereof.[19] Where the failure to execute the process before the expiration of his term constitutes a default on the part of the officer, the sureties on his bond for such term are liable for such default,[20] and, where the failure continues during a succeeding term, the injured person may proceed against the sureties on either or both the old and the new bond.[21] Under the rule considered supra § 50, that an officer who commences execution of process must complete it, where an officer commences the execution of process during one term of office, it is ordinarily held that his sureties for that term are responsible for whatever he does or neglects to do with relation thereto, although his default does not occur until after he has entered on a new term of office and qualified with new sureties,[22] and that the sureties for the new term cannot be held to respond for such default;[23] but there is also some authority to the contrary.[24]

(2) General and Special Bonds

Where a sheriff or constable gives a special bond in respect of particular duties as required by law, the liability for a default in respect of such duties falls on such special bond rather than on his general official bond; but, where the default is in respect of the officer's general duty or conduct, the liability falls on his general official bond, and not on the special bond.

Where a sheriff or constable is required by law to give a special bond in respect of particular duties, the liability for a default in respect of such duties falls on such special bond rather than on his general official bond,[25] and a surety on the special bond who is subjected to liability can have no recourse on the general official bond of the officer.[26] Where, however, the default of an officer is in respect of his general duty or conduct, the liability falls on his general official bond and not on a special bond which he may have given,[27] and a special bond given by an officer in a particular capacity or with respect to particular duties does not cover his acts or defaults in his general capacity as such officer.[28] Where a justice of the peace appoints a constable for a special purpose and by statute the surety on such justice's official bond becomes the surety of the constable so appointed, such surety, and not the surety on a private bond taken from the constable by the justice and made payable to the justice, is liable to the public generally or any person aggrieved by the illegal acts of such constable.[29]

(3) Bonds Given in Different Capacities

Where a sheriff or constable holds two distinct offices and gives an official bond for each office, liability for an act or default committed by him in the performance of the duties of one of such offices will be imposed only on the sureties on the bond given in respect thereof.

Where the same person holds two distinct offices as sheriff and constable, or sheriff and collector, and gives an official bond for each office, liability for an act or default committed by him in the performance of the duties of one of such offices will be imposed only on the sureties on the bond given in respect thereof, and not on the sureties on the bond given in respect of the other office.[30]

d. Liability on Bond Voluntarily Given in Addition to Required Bond

The sureties on an official bond voluntarily given by a sheriff or constable in addition to the required one will be liable for his neglect or improper conduct.

Although a sheriff or constable has been already inducted into office and is acting under an official bond duly accepted and approved, there is nothing to prevent him from voluntarily executing another official bond, and, if the latter bond is in proper form and is accepted and duly approved, he and his sureties will be liable on it for any neglect or other improper conduct.[31]

e. Defaults Prior to Execution or Approval of Bond

Except where otherwise provided by statute or by the terms of the bond, the sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are not liable for a default which occurred before the bond was executed or approved.

Except where otherwise provided by statute[32] or by the terms of the bond, the sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are not liable for a default which occurred before the bond was executed;[33] and where, under the statute, the bond takes effect only from its approval, there can be no recovery thereon for any act of the officer prior to such approval.[34] It has been held that the sureties of a sheriff are not responsible for money collected by him on an execution which came into his hands as deputy of a former sheriff, although the money was received after they become sureties.[35] The fact, however, that process was delivered to an officer before his bond was executed does not relieve his sureties from liability for his failure, after they became bound, to execute and return it.[36]

f. Duties Imposed on Officer after Execution of Bond

The official bond of a sheriff or constable refers to his duties as prescribed by law at the time of its execution and does not cover new duties thereafter imposed unless the words of the bond or the law in force at its date bring such subsequently imposed duties within its provisions.

The official bond of a sheriff or constable refers to the duties of the officer prescribed by law at the time of its execution[37] and does not cover new duties thereafter imposed on the officer by law,[38] unless the words of the bond or the law in force at its date, by a fair and reasonable construction, bring such subsequently imposed duties within its provisions.[39] Where duties existed at the time a bond was executed, however, the sureties cannot avoid liability with respect thereto on the ground that such duties were created by a statute enacted after that under provisions of which the bond was given.[40] Where a particular duty is a function of the office of sheriff unless some other officer is designated by law to perform it, the surety on the official bond of the sheriff is liable for defaults of the officer in the performance of such duty notwithstanding the sheriff was designated to perform that duty after the execution of the official bond.[41]

g. Unofficial Acts

Generally the official bond of a sheriff or constable imposes liability only for what the officer unlawfully does or omits to do in the execution of his office or of some official duty imposed by law, and does not cover any omission or act done without authority of law or in his private or personal capacity as a man or citizen.

As a general rule, the official bond of a sheriff or constable imposes liability only for what the officer unlawfully does or omits to do in the execution of his office or of some official duty imposed by law,[42] and does not cover any omission or act done without authority of law or in his private or personal capacity as a man or citizen,[43] or an act constituting a mere abuse or usurpation of power[44] and done without process of any kind.[45] Whether the officer was acting in his official capacity must be judged from what he said and did.[46] It is ordinarily held that the sureties are liable for a wrongful act done by an officer under color of office, although not by virtue thereof,[47] and so it is held that an officer assuming to act as such, who acts illegally, cannot escape liability therefor under his official bond on the ground of lack of legal authority to commit the act for which liability is asserted;[48] but there is authority for the view that the liability of the sureties extends only to acts done by virtue of the office and not to acts done merely under color of office.[49]

Acts as agent of party. Sureties on the bond of a sheriff or constable are not liable for acts done by him as agent of a party, and not as such officer;[50] and, where plaintiff in a writ interferes in the execution thereof by directing an officer to proceed in some way other than that prescribed by law, and so makes the officer his agent, the sureties are not liable for such acts.[51] The mere fact, however, that the judgment or order under which process issued was wrongfully procured by plaintiff does not make the officer his agent so as to relieve the sureties on his bond.[52] Similarly, the mere fact that the deputy of an officer is directed by the latter to levy a writ on particular property does not make him the officer's agent or servant or make the acts of such deputy so far unofficial or unauthorized as to render the sureties on his official bond not liable to the principal officer if the latter is subjected to damages in consequence of the deputy's acts.[53]

h. Acts of Sheriff outside State or of Constable outside Precinct or District

The surety on the official bond of a sheriff is not liable for acts of the sheriff outside the state, but, where the authority of a constable extends over the whole county, the sureties on his official bond are liable for his official acts within the county, although outside of his own precinct or district.

The surety on the official bond of a sheriff is not liable for acts of the sheriff outside the state, since with respect to such acts the sheriff had neither office nor color of office as a sheriff.[54] Where the authority of a constable extends over the whole county, the sureties on his official bond are liable for his official acts within the county, although outside of

i. Irregularities or Informalities in Bond

The sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are ordinarily not relieved of liability because of irregularities or informalities in the bond not rendering it defective in substance, or because of erroneous recitals therein.

The sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are ordinarily not relieved of liability thereon because of irregularities or informalities in the bond not rendering it defective in substance,[57] or because of erroneous recitals therein.[58] Similarly, failure to give a bond at the proper time does not affect its validity or the liabilities of the sureties thereon for defaults occurring after its execution,[59] and the validity of a bond otherwise regular is not affected by the fact that the penalty in which it should be given has not been fixed by the authority designated by law.[60] It is the more general rule that a bond given as an official bond by an officer, which is not valid as a statutory bond because not conforming to statute, may be enforced as a common-law bond,[61] but there is authority for the view that a bond containing a condition not authorized or required by law is void and unenforceable against the sureties.[62]

Excessive penalty. Where a bond is voluntarily given by a sheriff or constable, the fact that the penalty is larger than the statute prescribes does not relieve the sureties from liability for a breach.[63]

Lack of approval. According to some authorities the purpose of a statute requiring the approval of the official bond of a sheriff or constable is merely to insure greater security to the public,[64] and so such a bond may be enforced although it has been not approved,[65] or although the approval is defective.[66] According to other authorities, however, a bond not properly approved may not be enforced as a statutory bond.[67]

Lack of filing or recordation. Since statutory requirements of the filing or recordation of official bonds of sheriffs and constables are for the benefit of the public, such a bond may be enforced against the sureties although it has not been filed[68] at the time required by law,[69] or has not been recorded.[70]

Surety prohibited by statute from becoming such. An official bond of a sheriff or constable which is signed as surety by one who is prohibited by statute from becoming a surety on such bonds is nevertheless valid and binding as against him.[71]

Curative acts. An official bond of a sheriff or constable which is defective in that it purports to have been accepted by a person or authority who had no authority so to do is made valid ab initio by a subsequent statute declaring that such bonds shall be deemed to have been legally delivered;[72] but a bond failing to show which of two or more obligors is the officer and which sureties is not validated by a statute curing irregularities in the condition or penalty of such bonds.[73] A statute providing that any bonds which have been or may thereafter be given by any sheriff shall be held and deemed to be valid, notwithstanding any defect in the election or appointment of such person to office, applies to bonds made before its passage, as well as those made after it.[74]

j. Bond Procured by Misrepresentation

Sureties have been held not liable on the official bond of a sheriff or constable procured by false statements or misrepresentations of material fact.

Sureties on an official bond of a sheriff or constable have been held not liable thereon where the bond was procured by false statements or misrepresentations of material facts.[75] On the other hand, it has also been held that the fact that the officer may have misrepresented the facts to the surety company in obtaining the bond is immaterial as to the rights of an execution creditor against the surety, the remedy for the surety being an action against the person who made the false representations.[76]

k. Acts or Instructions of Complaining Party

Where an alleged default on the part of a sheriff or constable has been occasioned by the act or instructions of the party complaining thereof or his attorney, there can be no recovery therefor from the sureties on the official bond.

Where an alleged default on the part of a sheriff or constable has been occasioned by the act of the party complaining thereof, there can be no recovery therefor from the sureties on the officer's official bond;[77] nor can a plaintiff in process set up as a breach of the officer's bond acts done pursuant to his own instructions,[78] or the instructions[79] or advice[80] of his attorney, provided the attorney represented plaintiff in giving such instruction or advice,[81] and provided the officer in fact relied thereon.[82] Similarly, where plaintiff or his attorney is informed by the officer of what he proposes to do, and acquiesces therein, he cannot set up what is done as a breach of the bond;[83] nor can one who has ratified what has been done in his behalf subsequently hold the sureties liable for such acts.[84] Where a sheriff gives his deputy binding instructions as to what he shall do in connection with certain matters, and the sheriff is subjected to liability because of the deputy following such directions, he cannot resort to the deputy's bond for indemnity;[85] but a deputy's sureties cannot escape liability on the ground that his acts were pursuant to directions of the sheriff, where such directions were merely in the nature of information and advice, leaving the deputy at liberty to act according to his own judgment, and not binding instructions to be followed at all events,[86] nor is it a defense that the deputy's acts were done by leave of the sheriff.[87]

l. Lien Arising from Bond

Under statutes in some jurisdictions the execution of official bonds of sheriffs and constables creates a lien on the real estate of the officer and his sureties from the date of the bond or of its registry; and, where a judgment is obtained on the bond, there is a lien on all of the estate of the defendants from the time of the commencement of the action.

In some jurisdictions, under the statutes relating to the official bonds of sheriffs and constables, the execution of such a bond creates a lien on the real estate of the officer and his sureties[88] from the date of the bond[89] or of its registry,[90] whether such property was owned at the time of the execution of the bond[91] or is subsequently acquired,[92] and, where a judgment is obtained on the bond against the officer and his sureties, there is a lien on all of the estate of defendants from the time of the commencement of the action.[93] Such a lien operates for the protection of private individuals who may be injured by the acts of the officer as well as the state.[94] The lien does not expire with the officer's term of office,[95] but continues until he obtains his his deputies,[4] and this rule applies even though

which he is bound.[96] It has been held that the legal mortgage resulting from the registry of an official bond is extinguished by prescription, unless the bond is reinscribed within ten years from the date of registry;[97] but there is also authority, to the contrary that the lien is unlimited both in duration and extent[98]

m. Effect of Action Brought against Officer

The fact that a person injured by the official misconduct of a sheriff or constable has brought an action directly against the officer therefor does not bar another action on his official bond for the same cause.

The fact that a person injured by the official misconduct or default of a sheriff or constable has brought an action directly against the officer therefor does not bar another action on his official bond for the same cause, whether the judgment in the action against the officer alone has been in favor of plaintiff[99] or defendant.[1]

§ 179. —— Acts of Deputies and Assistants

One who is aggrieved by the official misconduct of a deputy sheriff may at his option sue either on the sheriff's bond or on the deputy's bond; and the sureties on the sheriff's bond may be held liable to answer for the official defaults or misconduct of the deputies; but such sureties are not liable for acts of a deputy outside the scope of his powers and duties, and not done in the performance of an official act, or for acts for which the sheriff was not personally liable.

One who is aggrieved by the official misconduct of a deputy sheriff may at his option sue either on the sheriff's bond or on the deputy's bond.[2] Where it is sought to hold the sureties on the sheriff's bond for acts of the deputies as officials and as acts of the sheriff himself, the rule that for many purposes a sheriff and his deputies are regarded in the law as one officer applies,[3] and so the sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are ordinarily liable to answer for the official defaults or misconduct of his deputies,[4] according to the authorities on the

Acts done colore officii or virtute officii

(1) There is some authority to the effect that the surety of a sheriff is liable for the consequences of a wrongful act of a deputy only when such act is done by virtue of the deputy's office, as distinguished from an act done under color of office merely.—State v. National Surety Co., 39 S W.2d 581, 162 Tenn 547.

(2) Thus, sureties on official bond of sheriff are liable for the act of a deputy done by virtue of his office, which means that the act must be done in an attempt to serve or execute a process or under a statute giving deputy the right to arrest without a warrant—State ex rel Blanchard v Fisher, Tenn, 245 S.W.2d 179

(3) Other authority holds that the sheriff's surety is liable for wrongful acts done either colore officii or virtute officii by deputy.—Biehn v Bannick, 7 P 2d 567, 166 Wash 465

(4) Fact that deputy imprisoned injured automobilist, arrested for public drunkenness, without commitment by magistrate, did not make deputy's custody illegal, even if imprisonment were unlawful, as regards liability on sheriff's official bond—State v National Surety Co, 39 S.W. 2d 581, 162 Tenn. 547.

(5) Unlawful treatment by deputy of prisoner whom he has lawfully arrested, whereby prisoner is injured, is wrong done by virtue of office, authorizing recovery on sheriff's official bond—State v. National Surety Co, supra

(6) Under statute providing that sheriffs and deputies shall be liable on their official bonds for the damage done by the unlawful or careless use of any pistol or revolver, whether or not such bond is so conditioned, unlawful use of weapon by tax collecting deputy sheriff creates liability on bond regardless of whether officer was acting colore officii.—Hatfield v. Hutton, 148 S.E. 2, 107 W.Va. 230.

Joint and several liability

Where deputy sheriff unlawfully spirited arrested prisoner out of county of prisoner's residence and secreted prisoner in distant jail, sureties on official bond of sheriff were jointly and severally liable with the deputies are deputies de facto,[5] to the same extent as the surety is liable for the official acts or omissions of the sheriff himself,[6] even though the county could not be held.[7] The surety on the sheriff's bond is not liable, however, for acts of a deputy outside the scope of his powers or duties and not done in the performance of an official act,[8] or for damages for acts of the deputies for which the sheriff was not personally liable,[9] even though the bond expressly covers the acts of the sheriff's deputies,[10] and a surety on the sheriff's bond is not liable for negligent or unlawful acts of deputy sheriffs while discharging their official duties unless such acts involved improper and unfaithful discharge of such duties.[11] Rural policemen who are statutory officers appointed by the sheriff have been held not deputy sheriffs with respect to liability of the sheriff's bond for their improper sheriff for unlawful trespass committed by deputy.—Moody v Kimball, Tex Civ.App, 173 S W 2d 270.

Pursuit across county line

Fact that deputy constable in attempting to make arrest for misdemeanor pursued fleeing car across county line and there shot passenger therein did not relieve constable's surety of liability.—State ex rel. and to Use of Kaercher v. Roth, 49 S.W. 2d 109, 330 Mo 105.

Assault on prisoner

Where deputy sheriffs struck prisoner when there was no need for doing so, their conduct is a violation of an official duty for which the surety of the sheriff is liable.—Dufrene v. Rodrigue, La App, 38 So 2d 511

Trespass and assault in executing writ

Negligent operation of motor vehicle

(1) Driving of sheriff's automobile by deputy sheriff is not sheriff's official act, so as to render surety on his bond liable for injuries resulting from deputy's negligence therein, unless it directly involves discharge of official duty.—Gray v De Bretton, App, 184 So 390, affirmed 188 So 722, 192 La 628

(2) Surety on official bond of sheriff was not liable for injuries to person struck by motor vehicle as result of deputy sheriff's alleged negligent operation of vehicle while conveying a prisoner to jail.
La.—Gray v De Bretton, 188 So 722, 192 La. 628.
Tex.—Ætna Casualty & Surety Co v Clark, 150 S W 2d 78, 136 Tex. 238

(3) The same rule has been applied where the injured person was struck by a vehicle driven by a deputy sheriff while returning from serving subpoenas in a criminal case, and the doctrine of respondeat superior is in no way involved in the determination.—Nelson v Bartell, 103 P.2d 30, 4 Wash 2d 174.

Acts in furtherance of unlawful conspiracy

Where deputy sheriff and others conspired to get a wife to return to her husband by having deputy, who was commissioned in another parish, serve a false warrant for her arrest, and while carrying out the conspiracy, one of the conspirators shot and killed a third person, surety on sheriff's bond was not liable to third person's widow for his death, since deputy was not acting with official authority.—Davis v McDowell, La. App, 185 So 634

Arrest

(1) The restraint of a person's liberty by a deputy sheriff to constitute an "arrest," so as to render surety liable for injuries inflicted on third person by deputy, must have been done for the actual or purported purpose of bringing restrained person before a court or otherwise securing the administration of the law.—State, for Use of Dew, v. Lightcap, 179 So. 880, 181 Miss 893.

(2) Surety was not liable for injuries sustained when deputy allegedly shot plaintiff because he insisted on being present while deputy talked to a third person, under evidence that deputy had no warrant for third person's arrest, that no circumstances appeared permitting arrest without a warrant, and that deputy told plaintiff that he did not have third person under arrest, since evidence showed as a matter of law that deputy was not acting under color of his office.—State, for Use of Dew, v. Lightcap, supra.

(3) Sureties on sheriff's official bond were only answerable for faithful performance of official duty, and were not liable for tort of deputies in making an arrest without a warrant.—Stephens v. Hinds, 194 S.W 2d 483, 183 Tenn 652

Tort unconnected with execution and return of process

(1) A sheriff's bond for due execution and return of process and faithful execution of his office does not impose liability on surety for deputy sheriff's negligent act unconnected with execution and return of process.—Davis v. Moore, 2 S E 2d 366, 215 N C. 449

(2) Accordingly, bond did not impose liability on surety for damages for injuries to a prisoner allegedly resulting from an assault on prisoner by deputy sheriff.—Hampton v. Williams, 4 S E 2d 446, 216 N.C. 796

Malicious prosecution

The surety of the sheriff is not liable for damages caused by a deputy's malicious prosecution not authorized by the sheriff.—Biehn v. Bannick, 7 P 2d 567, 166 Wash 465.

Although there is authority holding the sureties of the sheriff liable for the act of the deputy resulting in wrongful death,[13] the surety is not liable where the wrongful act of the deputy resulting in death was not strictly an act of misfeasance in office or wrongful performance of some official duty as deputy,[14] and, under a statute authorizing recovery for wrongful death resulting from the omission of an agent or servant, it has been held that the surety on the bond of a sheriff is not liable for damages for the wrongful act or omission of a deputy sheriff resulting in death,[15] unless the sheriff and his bondsman were present and aided and abetted in the offense complained of.[16]

Assistants Sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are not liable for defaults or misfeasances of subordinate assistants of the officer, in the absence of any negligence in the selection or appointment of such assistants or of failure properly to supervise their acts.[17]

Acts of another sheriff. Sureties on the official bond of a sheriff are not liable for the wrongful acts of the sheriff of another county who arrested a person without a warrant pursuant to a request of their principal[18]

§ 180. —— Duration of Liability

The sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are liable thereon for such defaults only as occur within the period or term covered by the bond, that is, for the period of time specified in the bond, unless liability is sooner released or the sureties discharged.

The sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are liable thereon for such defaults only as occur within the period or term covered by the bond,[19] and, where a bond is conditioned only for a specified time, it cannot be enlarged to embrace a default occurring after that time on the ground that the law requires a bond for the whole term of office[20] A bond remains valid and effective, and liability thereon continues, for its full term or the full period of time by it specified unless such liability is sooner released or the sureties discharged.[21]

Reason for rule

The right of action for wrongful death is purely statutory, being based on a statute in derogation of common law which will not be extended by construction beyond the reasonable import of its language, and the doctrine of respondeat superior does not apply to sheriff and deputy—Giles v. Invasion of right of privacy

Action of sheriff in requesting sheriff of another county to arrest named person did not give rise to a cause of action against sheriff making such request or surety on his official bond for breach of bond predicated on alleged invasion of right of privacy of arrested person's wife, although no warrant for such arrest had been issued at time request was made or at time of arrest, since sheriff in making such request did not counsel any wrongful act and could not reasonably foresee that an illegal arrest would in fact be made—Walker v Whittle, 64 S E 2d 87, 83 Ga App 445.

Bond given at beginning of term

(1) A bond given by a sheriff at the beginning of his term covers the whole term, and any bond subsequently given is merely additional security—Cotton v. Walton-Verona Independent Graded School Dist, 174 S W.2d 712, 295 Ky. 478—57 C J. p 1018 note 21 [a]

(2) The provisions of amendatory statute that sureties on sheriff's bond shall be liable only for sheriff's defalcations during year in which bond is executed and only if notice of sheriff's unlawful act or default is given sureties within following year are unconstitutional with respect to sheriff's prior bonds covering his entire term under law in effect at time of their execution—Cotton v. Wal-

Where the condition of the bond does not specify the period covered by the bond, recourse may be had to a recital of the bond which states the officer's term of office in order to show the intention of the parties that the bond was to cover the stated term of office [22]

Effect of termination of officer's incumbency As a general rule, the sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are not liable for his acts or defaults after he has gone out of office [23] So, where an officer goes out of office before commencing to execute process and before the return day thereof, his sureties cannot be held liable for his failure to execute or return it,[24] or for any of his acts with relation to the execution of such process after he has gone out of office;[25] and the surety is not liable for failure of the officer to make the return where the officer was not required to make the return before the return day and he resigned from his office before that day.[26] Where, however, an officer has commenced the execution of process while in office, and it is his right or duty to complete the execution thereof after his term expires, his sureties are liable for his defaults with respect thereto, although such defaults do not occur until after he has gone out of office.[27] Where an officer has received money by virtue of his office, the expiration of his term does not release his sureties from liability therefor;[28] and, in general, where the officer has been guilty of official default or misfeasances while in office, his sureties remain liable therefor notwithstanding the termination of his incumbency,[29] even though no action is commenced while he is in office [30] The sureties of an officer are also liable for money properly paid to him as such officer after he is out of office;[31] but they are not liable for his failure to pay over money voluntarily paid to him, or collected or received by him without authority, after the expiration of his term [32] Where a constable forfeits his office by removing from the town or county in respect of which he was elected or appointed, but continues to act as constable, the sureties on his bond are still liable for his acts as for those of a de facto officer.[33]

Holding over by officer. Where an officer's official bond is conditioned for the discharge of his duties until a successor shall be elected and qualified, the liability of his sureties continues until that event,[34] and it has been held that, where such officer is reelected and enters on his new term without giving a new bond, he may, with respect to the sureties on his old bond, be regarded as holding over so that they remain liable for his acts or defaults,[35] although on this point there is also authority to the contrary.[36] Where, however, the bond of an officer covers merely his term of office, and it is limited by statute, his sureties are not responsible for his defaults with respect to process coming into his hands after the expiration of his term and while he is acting merely de facto [37]

Deputy serving through successive terms. It has been held that, where a deputy sheriff or constable continues to be such without interruption during successive terms of office of his principal, an official bond given by such deputy does not expire on the expiration of the principal's term but continues as security for defaults occurring in a subsequent term,[38] but there is also authority for the view that, where an officer takes a bond from his deputy to indemnify him during his continuance in office, such bond refers only to the term of the principal's office then current, and cannot be held to embrace defaults which occur during a succeeding term.[39] Although the death of the sheriff would ordinarily terminate the liability of the surety on the bond of the deceased's deputy which was conditioned for a term of years,[40] where the deputy continued uninterruptedly to serve as such, under appointment by the successor of the deceased sheriff, the surety could, for a valuable consideration, waive the termination of its liability, so as to permit the bond to continue according to its terms[41]

Legislative extension of officer's term. When the term of office of a sheriff or constable is extended by an act of the legislature, he becomes his own successor, and the liability of his bondsmen continues until he qualifies as such or is displaced by a successor.[42]

Failure to renew bond. Where a sheriff or constable required by law to renew his official bond at periodic intervals fails to effect such renewal, but continues in office and remains such officer de facto, the sureties on his original bond have been held liable for any subsequent breach of his official duty.[43] Where the failure to renew the bond ipso facto vacates or forfeits the office, the sureties on the original bond are not liable for any defaults occurring after the occurrence of the vacancy.[44]

Death of officer. Where an action is pending against an officer and his sureties at the time of his death, it survives as against the sureties,[45] but, where at the time of the death of an officer he is in no default for which his sureties are liable, subsequent events cannot subject them to any liability on the bond.[46]

§ 181. —— Extent of Liability

The extent of the liability of a surety on the bond of a sheriff or constable is to be ascertained from the terms of the bond strictly and reasonably construed; and a surety is not to be held liable beyond the clear scope and purpose of his undertaking.

The extent of the liability of a surety on the bond of a sheriff or constable is to be ascertained from the terms of the bond,[47] strictly construed so as not to extend the liability by implication beyond its terms,[48] but also reasonably construed so as not to defeat the purpose of requiring sureties for the protection of the public against official misconduct,[49] and a surety is not to be held liable beyond the clear scope and purpose of his undertaking.[50] The statutes relating to sheriffs' bonds and official bonds generally have been held not to permit forfeiture of a sheriff's bond in its entirety without reference to any definite pleaded or proved amount of defalcation or fraudulent overcharge by, or damage for misconduct of, the principal.[51] Where an officer has paid over amounts collected as taxes, directing them to be applied to the taxes of a particular year, to which they are properly applicable, his sureties for that year are entitled to credit for the full amounts

Reasons for rule

(1) Bond is for purpose of indemnifying obligee or any person suffering injury or loss because of official malfeasance, misfeasance, or nonfeasance—State ex rel. Switzer v. Overturff, supra.

(2) The statutes fixing minimum amount as penalty of sheriff's bond, but permitting county boards of supervisors to fix larger amounts without limit, do not authorize such boards to fix penalties for official wrongdoing, but merely permit them to fix larger indemnities in counties wherein larger amounts seem necessary or desirable because of size of other circumstance.—State ex rel. Switzer v. Overturff, supra.

(3) The term "penalty" means any extraordinary legal liability of wrongdoer to person wronged, not limited to damages, and may merely connote security for damage actually caused by breach, with recovery limited to compensatory amount, unless stipulated or liquidated damages are clearly intended—State ex rel. Switzer v. Overturff, supra.

on their liability for the taxes of such year,[52] and the officer's sureties are entitled to credit for an amount due to such officer,[53] as where warrants have been issued by the county and are unpaid,[54] provided they produce and surrender such warrants or show that the officer is still the holder thereof;[55] but, where judgment has been entered against an officer and his sureties on his bond, the sureties are not to be credited with payments made by the officer, or obtained by process out of his property, on account of the official debt or default for which the judgment was obtained,[56] and they remain liable for his defalcations, to the extent of their aliquot parts of the penalty, after all his means are exhausted.[57] Where a fine or penalty imposed on an officer for an official default is paid by his sureties, in any subsequent proceeding against them founded on the same default they are entitled to a credit on the amount for which they are liable to the extent of the fine or penalty so paid.[58] Where additional sureties are given on an officer's bond, in place of those who have died, removed, or become insolvent, all the sureties are liable to the officer's creditors for their aliquot proportions of the penalty, according to the number in the original bond.[59] Sureties are not entitled to any credit, on the amount for which they are liable to a creditor of the officer, for payments made to extinguish interest on the creditor's demand during the pendency of the suit to determine their liability, or for costs of such suit paid by them.[60]

Extent of liability as affected by penal sum named in bond. While the penalty named in the official bond cannot be treated as liquidated damages for the officer's breach of the conditions thereof,[61] in general, the liability of the sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable is limited to the penal sum named therein[62] or to the minimum penal sum required by statute where that sum is greater than the sum named in the bond,[63] and a recovery for the full amount of the bond prevents a recovery from the sureties for any other defaults,[64] even though actions therefor are then pending.[65] The recovery of interest on the amount for which the officer's misconduct or default has rendered the sureties liable is not, however, precluded by the fact that the addition thereof raises their liability to an amount exceeding the penal sum of the bond.[66]

Liability for fine or penalty. Sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are not liable for a statutory penalty or fine for which the officer has become liable or which has been imposed on him for an official default,[67] except where such liability is imposed on them by statute.[68] Where the sureties are so made liable therefor, however, their liability is not affected by the fact that the complaining party has suffered no loss or damage from the default in respect of which the penalty has been imposed.[69]

§ 182. —— Discharge, Release, or Withdrawal of Sureties

General rules relating to the release and discharge of sureties have been applied to sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable, and, accordingly, under the circumstances of the particular case, it has been held that such sureties may or may not be discharged or released by acts of the court, governor, legislature, or the plaintiff, by giving new or additional bond, by alteration of the bond, by forfeiture of office, or by withdrawal of the sureties.

The rules relating to the release and discharge of sureties generally, which are discussed in Principal and Surety §§ 116-244, have been applied to sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable.[70] Sureties of an officer who, being insolvent and liable for defaults of his deputy, has delivered to them the official bond of his deputy have no authority to discharge the bond or the sureties thereon, but only to resort thereto as far as may be necessary for their own indemnity.[71]

Release or discharge by court. A court by which the official bond of a sheriff or constable has been approved, or the justices thereof, have no authority to discharge the obligation of the sureties thereon by authorizing or permitting the substitution of another bond,[72] except where authority so to do is given by statute.[73] Where such a statute exists, an application for such a discharge must be made on notice to the officer,[74] stating why the discharge is asked;[75] and, where the officer denies the matters assigned as cause for seeking the release, such matters must be proved on the trial or hearing.[76] When the principal fails to execute a new bond, the surety cannot be relieved of liability unless and until the court makes such orders as will protect the trust or estate which has been confided to the fiduciary or officer.[77] Under a statute allowing the discharge of the sureties "for good cause," any reasonable cause, whether it relates to the surety or to the officer alone, or to both, may be deemed sufficient;[78] and the court judging of the cause must be allowed a considerable discretion,[79] and its conclusion as to the sufficiency of the cause will not be disturbed by a higher court unless for a palpable mistake of judgment.[80]

Action of governor. Under a statute providing that the governor may erase and annul all bonds and all mortgages furnished by any public officer, the cancellation by the governor of the official bond of a sheriff or constable and the erasure of the mortgage discharge the sureties from liability on such bond.[81] Where an officer is released by proclamation of the governor, acting under statutory authority, from liability for state funds deposited in a bank which subsequently failed, his sureties are discharged from liability for such funds.[82]

Legislative release. Where a judgment has been rendered in favor of the state on a sheriff's bond for the amount thereof, and an assessment of damages for the breaches assigned has been made, an act of the legislature releasing, on specified conditions, defendant's liability on the judgment has been held to be construable as a release only of the judgment so fixed and determined, and not of any liability thereafter to be established.[83]

Change in law. The mere enactment of a new law or a change in existing law with respect to sheriffs and constables, or their office, after the execution of an official bond of such an officer does not discharge or release the sureties on such bond where no change is made which operates to their prejudice.[84] It has been held that, where the change increases the risk of the sureties, it operates to release them,[85] but there is also authority, to the contrary, that the sureties are not discharged by such a change [86]

Acts or instructions of plaintiff. The sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are discharged from liability for the acts or defaults of the officer in connection with the execution of process by the voluntary dismissal by plaintiff of the suit in which such process issued,[87] even though the motion to dismiss is made because of the officer's irregularities.[88] Where an execution plaintiff authorizes an officer who has collected money on the writ to retain it in his possession, the sureties are discharged from liability for its proper payment;[89] but permission given by a clerk of court to an officer to postpone the payment over of the clerk's fees collected on execution as part of the costs has been held not to discharge the officer's sureties.[90] An officer's sureties are not released from liability by the consent of plaintiff to the discharge of a prisoner in the officer's custody, on giving security, where it appears that such consent was given in reliance on the officer's liability [91] The negligence of a county board in not investigating an officer's accounts and ascertaining the amount of his earnings does not relieve the sureties on his bond of liability for money erroneously paid to such officer by the county for a supposed deficit in his compensation where such deficit was made to appear by his failure to report to the board all the earnings of his office.[92] Where a bond is joint and several, the sureties are not discharged by striking the officer as a party defendant in a suit on the bond, or dismissing the suit as to him.[93]

Discharge by giving new bond Unless otherwise provided by statute, the giving of a new official bond by a sheriff or constable does not release or discharge the sureties on an earlier bond, and the new bond is merely cumulative or additional security.[94] Under a statute providing for the discharge of sureties on official bonds after the giving of a new bond as therein provided for, the sureties on an officer's official bond are not released by the erasure of their names and the substitution of the names of others by direction of the county board of supervisors [95]

Giving additional bond not required by statute. The fact that a sheriff or constable gives a voluntary bond in addition to the official bond required by statute does not release the sureties on the official bond,[96] even with respect to the particular defaults to which the additional bond relates [97]

Alteration of the bond by the county judges by reducing the amount of the penalty therein renders the bond void as to sureties who executed it prior to its alteration.[98]

Forfeiture of office. The sureties on an official bond of a sheriff or constable are not relieved from liability for the officer's failure to pay over money collected by him by the fact that he has forfeited his office.[99]

Withdrawal of sureties. In the absence of statute otherwise providing, a surety on the official bond of a deputy sheriff or constable cannot discharge himself from liability on his bond by giving notice to the officer that he will no longer be bound for the deputy,[1] or by giving notice to the officer of the deputy's unfitness for office and requesting his removal.[2] Where, however, provision is made therefor by statute, a surety may, on the breach of the bond by the sheriff or constable, seek release from future liability[3] by serving on the proper officer whose duty it is to approve the bond a written notice that he desires to be relieved from his suretyship,[4] and presenting, with his demand for release, the grounds on which he bases that demand,[5] and the surety of a deputy may withdraw as such by serving on the officer a notice that he will not be further bound,[6] although such a notice does not operate to discharge the surety until a reasonable time has elapsed, sufficient to enable the officer to give notice to the deputy and the other sureties and to permit a new bond to be given.[7] Where the procedure for withdrawal is properly pursued by all the parties if more than one, and a new bond is given and accepted, the sureties on the old bond are discharged from further liability.[8]

§ 183. Matters Giving Rise to Liability

Sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are answerable for any official misconduct or neglect on his part which proximately causes injury or damage to another; but, where the officer has acted in accordance with the law, his sureties cannot be held liable in damages.

The general rule is that the sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are answerable for any official misconduct or neglect on his part which causes injury or damage to another,[9] provided such misconduct or neglect is the proximate cause of such injury or damage.[10] No liability can be founded on a failure or refusal of an officer to do an act not required of him by law.[11] So, where the officer has acted in accordance with the law, his sureties cannot be held liable in damages,[12] and, where there is no theory on which the officer could be held liable for a particular act or omission, his sureties are not liable therefor.[13]

§ 184. —— Defaults or Improprieties with Respect to Execution of Process

a Defaults
b Improprieties

a. Defaults

(1) In general
(2) Particular matters affecting liability
(3) Extent of liability

(1) In General

Sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are liable for his neglect of duties or for a breach of its condition in connection with the service or execution of process, as where there is a failure to serve or delay in serving, failure to index, an improper preference to a junior writ, an improper stay of execution, or an insufficient levy.

The official bond of a sheriff or constable is liable for his neglect of duties in connection with the service of process[14] Thus, in the absence of any legal excuse for such failure, sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are liable for a breach of its condition by the officer's failure to serve process,[15] or to deliver personalty for sale in accordance with a foreclosure decree,[16] or to levy an attachment or execution.[17] The quashal of a levy as invalid does not, however, of itself show such a failure to make proper levy as to impose liability on the officer's sureties.[18]

Delay. An unreasonable delay in executing process placed in his hands constitutes a breach of the official bond of a sheriff or constable,[19] but a delay which under the circumstances is not unreasonable gives rise to no liability;[20] and as respects liability of the surety, the sheriff is justified in relying upon the judge's oral direction to withhold execution until a certain date.[21]

Failure to index. Where the sheriff to whom a foreign execution is directed levies on the judgment debtor's realty but fails to index the execution and levy in the debtor's name, and the lien of the execution is lost because of the debtor's sale of the realty to an innocent purchaser, the judgment creditor damaged thereby may recover from the bondsmen of the sheriff for negligence in failing to index in the foreign execution docket, in the name of the judgment debtor, the case in which the execution is issued, as required by statute.[22]

Giving preference to junior writ. A sheriff or constable who knowingly or negligently gives preference to a junior execution instead of levying first under the writ which first came to his hands is liable on his official bond to the senior execution creditor.[23] It has also been held that, where a constable, at different times, levies a number of writs in his hands without regard to, or mention of, an intermediate levy made by a sheriff, and such intermediate levy is, in consequence, ignored in the application of the proceeds of the property, the sureties on the constable's bond are liable.[24]

Improperly staying execution. Where the statute provides that, whenever any goods and chattels liable for the payment of rent shall be seized in execution, the proceedings on such execution shall not be stayed by plaintiff therein without the consent of the landlord, a sheriff or constable who returns an execution stayed after notice of the landlord's claim and without the consent of the latter is liable therefor on his official bond.[25]

Insufficient levy Where a sheriff or constable makes an insufficient levy under an execution against a defendant who has sufficient property available to satisfy the entire debt, the sureties on his official bond are liable for his default[26]

(2) Particular Matters Affecting Liability

Various matters have been held to affect, or not to affect, the liability of the surety on the official bond of a sheriff or constable for default of the latter with respect to the execution of process.

Where the failure of a sheriff or constable to execute process is caused by plaintiff therein, no liability on his official bond arises because of such failure[27] A plaintiff or his attorney is not guilty of such negligence as will prevent a recovery on the bond for the officer's failure to serve process on a defendant, because he did not see to it, by examining the papers, that defendant was served [28]

Authority or duty to execute process. Where a sheriff or constable has no legal authority to serve or execute process delivered to him, his failure to do so cannot constitute a breach of his official bond or render the sureties thereon liable.[29] It has been held that the sureties of a sheriff or constable are not liable for his failure to levy a writ where no order or direction to levy has been given by plaintiff therein,[30] or where such an order or direction is afterward withdrawn.[31] It has also been held that the failure or refusal of a constable to levy an execution which, under a statute requiring executions to be directed to constables of particular districts or townships, should not have been directed to him gives rise to no cause of action on his bond [32]

Depreciation of property after levy Where a sheriff or constable levies on sufficient property to satisfy an execution, but before he can sell it the property depreciates in value by reason of casualties over which he has no control, and fails to sell for enough to satisfy the execution, no liability arises on his official bond as for an insufficient levy.[33]

Existence or validity of judgment on which process based The failure of a sheriff or constable to execute final process is none the less a breach of his official bond, for which the sureties thereon are liable, because the judgment on which such process is based is irregular, if it is not void,[34] but a plea denying the existence of such a judgment as the one on which it is alleged the execution issued presents a sufficient defense,[35] and, similarly, no liability arises for failure of the officer to levy on the property of a replevin bail where the latter's undertaking is void [36] No attack on the merits of the judgment, however, can be made in an action to hold the sureties liable [37]

Impossibility of executing process. The failure of a sheriff or constable to execute process cannot constitute a breach of his official bond, or give rise to liability on the part of the sureties thereon, where the circumstances are such that he could not lawfully execute it,[38] or where he has made diligent effort to execute the process and has been unable to do so [39]

Insolvency of defendant. No liability can be imposed on the sureties in the official bond of a sheriff or constable for his failure to levy an execution, where it appears that at the time he received the execution, and continuously thereafter during his term of office, the execution debtor was insolvent,[40] or that a levy under the writ would have precipitated an immediate proceeding in bankruptcy,[41] but the mere fact that the debtor is reputed to be insolvent will not release the officer from liability on his official bond for failure to use due diligence in endeavoring to collect the debt.[42]

Invalidity or irregularity of process. If the process is not void, the fact that it is irregular does not preclude liability on the bond of a sheriff or constable for the officer's failure to execute it,[43] or for his failure to index the case as required under the circumstances,[44] although it has been held that the irregularity may be shown in mitigation of damages;[45] but the sureties cannot be held to re-

Irregularities not affecting liability

(1) Where execution issued some six and one half years after entry of judgment showed that judgment was one for alimony or support money, or both, surety could not escape liability for failure of sheriff to serve execution on ground that it was not regular on its face, in that statute provides that no execution shall be issued on a judgment after expiration of five years from date of its entry unless such judgment is revived, since a judgment for support does not become dormant as a whole and statute would apply to each installment as it became due.—Schuster v. Merrill, 106 P 2d 192, 56 Ariz. 114.

(2) Surety could not escape liability for failure to carry out the commands of a writ of execution on ground that execution was uncertain in its direction as to the amount of the judgment, interest, and costs required to be collected from judgment debtor, where principal of the judgment was named and the interest due could be easily ascertained.—Schuster v. Merrill, supra

spond for the officer's failure to execute process which is void on its face,[46] and, where the officer was justified in refusing to execute a writ because of its irregularity, his sureties are not liable for his failure to execute it.[47]

Levy on sufficient property. No liability arises on the official bond of a sheriff or constable for his failure to levy an execution on particular property pointed out to him by the execution plaintiff where he levies on other property of defendant sufficient to satisfy the writ.[48]

Liability of property to seizure The failure of a sheriff or constable to levy on property which he cannot lawfully seize under the process in his hands,[49] such as property which is exempt,[50] cannot constitute a breach of his official bond or give rise to any liability on the part of his sureties. A mistaken belief of the officer, however, that the property is exempt will not relieve his sureties from liability for his failure to levy[51] or for his release of the property after having levied on it[52] A mere suspicion that there may be some difficulty with regard to the title to property pointed out to a sheriff or constable does not relieve him from liability on his official bond for refusing to seize it under an execution,[53] and in the absence of anything to rebut the presumption of ownership of goods in defendant's possession the officer is not justified in failing to levy thereon,[54] but in an action for failure to levy on property after being indemnified, it may be shown in mitigation of damages that the property belonged to a person other than the execution defendant and was, therefore, not subject to levy.[55]

Pressure of other official business. A failure on the part of a sheriff or constable to execute process placed in his hands for execution is not excused, nor are the sureties on his official bond relieved of liability, by the fact that the officer was engaged in other duties pertaining to his office,[56] but the extent and urgency of an officer's business and duties during the period between his receipt of process and his execution thereof may be shown as bearing on his good faith and diligence with respect thereto.[57]

Prior liens on property. The sureties of a sheriff or constable are not relieved from liability on his official bond for his failure or refusal to levy on particular property by the fact that such property was subject to mortgage, and, therefore, the levy might have been valueless.[58]

Prior writs against same defendant. The sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are not relieved from liability for his failure to levy an execution by the fact that he had a prior execution against the same defendant in his hands, unless it was actually levied,[59] and it has been held that, where an officer holds property under an attachment, and another writ is placed in his hands, it is his duty to execute the process subject to the prior attachment, and he will be liable on his bond for a failure so to do.[60]

Want of indemnity. The fact that indemnity has not been furnished to a sheriff or constable will not absolve him or his sureties from liability on his official bond for his defaults in the execution of a writ where he commenced the execution thereof without demanding such indemnity,[61] and the failure of an officer to execute process cannot be excused on the ground that the sureties on the bond of indemnity furnished to him were insolvent or insufficient, where he accepted the bond[62] Where, however, an officer is entitled to indemnity and demands it, and it is not furnished, no liability arises on his bond for a failure to execute the process[63]

(3) Extent of Liability

Sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are ordinarily liable for the officer's failure properly to serve or execute process to the extent of the loss sustained by reason of such failure.

Sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are ordinarily liable for the officer's failure properly to serve or execute process to the full extent of the loss sustained by the complaining party by reason of such failure[64] Prima facie the liability is for the amount of the debt for the collection of which the process issued,[65] together with interest and costs;[66] but in an action founded on an insufficient levy, the actual injury, and not necessarily the amount of the execution, is the measure of damages.[67]

b. Improprieties

Recovery may be had on the official bond of a sheriff or constable for any official misconduct in connection with the execution of process.

In general, recovery may be had on the official bond of a sheriff or constable for any official misconduct in connection with the execution of process,[68] even though the act in question was malicious,[69] and even though the process is not based on the judgment of a competent court, if it is regular on its face.[70] Thus the sureties on the bond may be held liable for the officer's failure to note on an execution the time of its delivery to him, where that is required by statute,[71] for a levy which would not have been necessary except that the officer had wasted property of the principal debtor previously levied on,[72] or for oppressive acts on the part of the officer, such as cause unnecessary hardship to defendant in the writ,[73] but the mere fact that the property seized was intended for a special purpose and that on the sale it does not realize the amount it would have brought to the execution defendant if used for such intended purpose does not of itself show that the levy was oppressive.[74] Where a sheriff or constable breaks into a dwelling while executing civil process, he is guilty of unlawful conduct in the actual discharge of his duties, and is not acting merely by color of his office, and the sureties on his bond are, therefore, liable for his acts.[75]

Acts done in further execution of partially executed writ are properly regarded as done while executing such writ, so as to render the sureties liable for them if wrongful or improper.[76]

Effect of invalidity of process. It has been held that sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are not relieved from liability for wrongful acts by such officer in connection with the execution of process by the fact that such process is invalid.[77]

a. In general
b. Particular matters affecting liability
c. Extent of liability

a. In General

The official bond of an officer is liable for his neglect of duties or official misconduct in connection with the making of levies, and, accordingly, the act of a sheriff or constable in seizing under process property not subject to levy is a breach of his official bond for which the sureties thereon are liable.

bond for which the sureties thereon are liable,[79] as where he levies on property subject to a landlord's lien, with notice thereof,[80] or where he levies on and removes mortgaged property after notice of the mortgagee's right of possession.[81] So there is a breach of the official bond of a sheriff or constable, which renders the sureties thereon liable, when the officer levies on exempt property[82] or refuses to restore exempt property levied on when a proper claim therefor is made;[83] and, where a levying officer is required by statute to apprise the execution defendant of his exemption rights, a failure so to do renders his sureties liable[84] except where it appears that such defendant knew of his rights and claimed his exemptions at the proper time.[85] A debtor cannot, however, predicate liability on a failure to set off his exemptions out of property levied on where it does not belong to such debtor.[86]

Levy on property not belonging to defendant in writ. The seizure by a sheriff or constable of property of one person under process against another has been held to be a breach of his official bond, for which his sureties are liable,[87] notwithstanding it is an excess of the officer's authority and a trespass,[88] but there is also authority to the contrary.[89]

b. Particular Matters Affecting Liability

The liability of the sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable for a wrongful seizure of property by the officer is not affected by absence of malice, the subsequent disposition of the property seized, or by want of the officer's authority, and, although there is some authority to the contrary, it has been held that the sureties may be liable although the property was seized under void or voidable process.

The liability of the sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable for a wrongful seizure of property by the officer is not affected by the absence of malice on the part of a sheriff or constable in making the wrongful levy or seizure,[90] by the subsequent disposition of the property seized or its proceeds,[91] or by the fact that the process was one which the officer had no authority to execute.[92]

Validity of process. According to some authorities, a wrongful levy on, or seizure of, property by a sheriff or constable under process which is void on its face is not a breach of his official bond and does not give rise to any liability on the part of his sureties,[93] but under the rule, discussed supra § 178 g, that sureties are liable for acts done by an officer under color of office although without authority the contrary view has also been taken.[94] The sureties may be compelled to respond for a wrongful seizure under process which is voidable merely.[95]

The fact that a wrongful seizure of, or levy on, property was made by a sheriff or constable under the mistaken belief that a writing was valid as process does not render it any the less an official act and so a breach of his bond.[96]

Fraudulent disposal of property by defendant in writ A sheriff or constable cannot escape liability on his official bond for seizing and selling exempt property under execution by setting up that at the time of the seizure the execution defendant was fraudulently selling and disposing of such property.[97]

Title to property. In an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable by one claiming property levied on under a writ directed against a third person, the right or title of plaintiff is subject to attack.[98]

c. Extent of Liability

Within the limits of the penal sum named in the bond, the sureties on the bond of a sheriff or constable are liable for the full value of property wrongfully seized by him and not recovered or restored to the owner thereof or for the depreciation in its value while withheld, if recovered or restored, together with damages for loss of use.

Subject to the rule stated supra § 181 that the amount of the liability may not exceed the penal sum named in the bond, where property wrongfully levied on, or seized by, a sheriff or constable is not recovered by, or restored to, the owner thereof, the sureties on the officer's official bond are liable for the full value of the property,[99] and if the property is so recovered or restored the sureties must respond for any depreciation in its value while it was withheld,[1] together with such damages as may have accrued to the owner by reason of the loss of use of the property.[2] The fact that property wrongfully seized or levied on is subsequently purchased by the owner at the sale does not affect the liability of the sureties or the measure of the owner's damages.[3] Where the goods of a tenant subject to a landlord's lien are wrongfully levied on, whereby the landlord is prevented from enforcing his lien for rent under the lease, the landlord's measure of damages is the amount of his lien and not the value of the property levied on where such value exceeds the amount of the lien.[4]

§ 186. —— Defaults with Respect to Custody of Property

a. In general
b. Particular matters affecting liability
c Extent of liability

a. In General

The sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are liable where, as the result of negligence or wrongful acts of such officer, property in his custody is damaged or lost, whether the property is lost outright or merely lost to the party.

The sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are liable where, as the result of negligence or wrongful acts of such officer, property in his custody is damaged[5] or lost,[6] whether the property is lost outright or merely lost to the creditor under whose process it was seized,[7] and where a sheriff or constable, having seized property in detinue, delivers it to plaintiff in the suit before the expiration of the statutory period within which defendant has a right to recover its possession by furnishing a bond, whereby the property is lost to defendant, the sureties on his official bond are liable for such wrongful act.[8] So the sheriff is answerable on his official bond for damage resulting from hiring out, in violation of statute, without the consent of both parties and the court, personalty he holds under seizure.[9] The mere fact, however, that property levied on is left in custody of defendant in the writ does not of itself make the officer liable on his bond for a subsequent loss.[10] to the owner or another particular person, his failure or refusal to do so is a breach of his official bond[11]

Failure to have property forthcoming. The sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are liable for his failure to deliver attached property in order to satisfy the judgment in the attachment suit[12] except, it has been held, where other property sufficient to satisfy the judgment is offered[13] A demand on an officer ordinarily is necessary to render his sureties liable for a failure on his part to have property forthcoming[14] unless facts exist which supersede the necessity for a demand.[15]

Incurrence of unnecessary expense in custody of property. The sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable have been held liable to one subjected by the acts of the officer to unnecessary expense in connection with the custody of property seized or levied on by him for the amount of such expense.[16]

Release of property from levy. An unauthorized release by a sheriff or constable of property theretofore seized or levied on by him is a breach of his official bond for which the sureties thereon are liable;[17] and the fact that a levy was excessive will not affect the liability for a release of the whole levy without authority.[18] It has been held, however, that where the special property acquired by an officer in goods levied on is not, under the statute, terminated by the expiration of his term, and his duty with respect thereto is not at an end on the delivery of such goods to his successor, the sureties of a successor officer are not liable for his act in releasing goods delivered to him by his predecessor, since he is only the agent or bailee of the latter with respect to such goods.[19] The fact that the sheriff accepted an insolvent surety on a replevy bond will not authorize recovery on the sheriff's bond where the sheriff exercised due care.[20]

b. Particular Matters Affecting Liability

Various matters have been held to affect, or not to affect, the liability of the sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable for defaults of the officer with respect to the custody of property.

The fact that the process under which property was seized by a sheriff or constable is irregular does not relieve the sureties on his official bond from liability for his neglect or misconduct with respect to the care and custody of such property,[21] nor can the legality of the levy be attacked in an action on the bond of an officer for releasing property levied

Materiality or pertinency of particular circumstances

Release without taking proper bond

(1) Where attachment was levied creating actual lien not subject to defeat by bankruptcy adjudication, sheriff and his general bondsman were liable for loss sustained by judgment creditor due to sheriff's release of attached property, without obtaining proper bond, notwithstanding bankruptcy of judgment debtor —Sparks v Buckner, 57 P.2d 1395, 14 Cal App 2d 213

(2) Where sheriff levied justice court fieri facias without having demanded of plaintiff additional cost which he was entitled on demand to receive, and thereafter released property without taking required bond, and damage resulted to plaintiff, it was no defense in action against surety that additional fee to which sheriff was entitled had not been paid in advance —Eslinger v. Land, 163 S E 522, 45 Ga App 96

Inadequacy of release bond

Bond, obtained by sheriff who released attached property, which indemnified sheriff against claims of third-person claimants to the property, was inadequate to charge surety with obligation to pay amount of judgment, when property was released, and was not valid as a common-law release bond, with respect to liability of sheriff and his general bondsman for loss sustained by judgment creditor —Sparks v Buckner, 57 P 2d 1395, 14 Cal.App.2d 213

on, or seized by, his deputy [22] The fact that a sheriff or constable has made a return of process executed by his deputy does not amount to an adoption of the acts of the deputy so as to preclude a suit by the officer on the deputy's official bond for the loss of property seized under such process [23] The liability for sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable for the wrongful release by him of property in his custody is not affected by the fact that such property might subsequently have been seized and sold under final process in the suit unless the failure to effectuate such subsequent seizure is caused by plaintiff's willful default.[24] The discharge of sureties on an attachment bond by a person to whom attached property should have been delivered by a sheriff or constable does not relieve the sureties on the officer's official bond of liability for his failure to make such delivery.[25]

The sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are relieved of liability for his failure to return a note delivered to, and received by, him for collection, where the officer has obtained judgment on the note, since it is thereby merged in the judgment.[26] Sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are not liable to one for the loss of property, or of his lien thereon, while such property is in custody of the officer, where such loss is caused by the act or negligence of the complaining party.[27] Where property in the possession of a sheriff under an attachment is taken out of his possession by the coroner by virtue of a writ of detinue, the sureties on the sheriff's official bond cannot be held liable for his failure to deliver up the property to satisfy the judgment in the attachment suit [28]

Reversal of decision holding property not exempt Where property levied on, or seized by, a sheriff or constable has been held by the court not to be exempt, the sureties on his official bond are not rendered liable for his refusal to release or return such property to defendant by the fact that on appeal such property is subsequently held to be exempt.[29]

Tender and refusal. The sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable cannot be held liable for his failure to deliver property to the party entitled thereto where defendant, in whose possession such property was left, tenders it to such party and the tender is refused;[30] but a tender to the attorney of the party entitled to the property does not relieve the sureties of liability.[31]

c. Extent of Liability

Within the limits of the penal sum named in the bond, sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable must respond for property lost by the neglect or wrongful acts of the officer to the extent of the value of the property or to the amount of the creditor's debt if the value exceeds the amount of the debt.

Subject to the rule, discussed supra § 181, that sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are not liable for an amount greater than the penal sum named in their bond, they must respond for property lost by the neglect or wrongful acts of the officer to the extent of the full value of such property[32] except where its value exceeds the amount of the creditor's debt, in which case the latter sum is the measure of their liability to him.[33] An officer's failure or refusal to deliver property to the person entitled thereto cannot impose liability on his sureties for the full value of such property, where it was afterward duly delivered [34]

§ 187. —— Matters Relating to Sales

b. Particular matters affecting liability
c. Extent of liability

The sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are liable for his neglect of duties or official misconduct with respect to sales under process.

property which is exempt from execution,[36] or where he sells mortgaged chattels under a writ and delivers them to the purchaser without requiring him to comply with the conditions of the mortgage,[37] or where, in violation of statute, the officer sells mortgaged realty in fee, although the rents and profits have been appraised at a sum more than sufficient to satisfy the execution and costs,[38] or where he sells property subject to a landlord's lien, with notice that rent is in arrears, and without satisfying the landlord,[39] or where he substitutes and sells, under a writ, property of the debtor other than that levied on and advertised for sale, under an agreement with the debtor;[40] but the sureties are not liable for an officer's act in selling exempt property where he acts under a chattel mortgage containing a power of sale, and not in his official capacity.[41] So the sureties may be compelled to respond for the officer's breach of duty in selling property without giving the notice of sale required by statute,[42] in selling at a private, rather than public, sale property levied on, or seized by, him,[43] or in fraudulently executing and signing in his official capacity a bill of sale of stolen property which sale purported to be based on the foreclosure of a lien.[44]

Sale of property not belonging to defendant in process. A sale by a sheriff or constable of property not belonging to defendant in the process under which the sale is made is a breach of his official bond for which the sureties thereon may be compelled to respond,[45] and sureties of an officer who sells, under an execution against the holder, property held by virtue of a contract of conditional sale, and delivers it to the purchaser without requiring him to fulfill the conditions of the contract, are liable on his official bond to the real owner of the property.[46] The silence of the owner, although he is cognizant that the sale is being or about to be made, does not preclude a recovery by him on the bond.[47]

Failure to make known defect in title to property sold. Where a sheriff or constable on offering property for sale under execution fails to make known a defect of title which is within his knowledge, he and the sureties on his official bond are responsible to the purchaser to the extent of the injury resulting from such failure of duty.[48]

Ineffective sale. Where a sheriff or constable acts in good faith in selling property under an execution, there is no breach of his official bond because by reason of his mistake or oversight the purchaser obtains no title.[49]

Failure to sell The failure of a sheriff or constable to sell property which he has levied on under execution or which it has in any other manner become his duty to sell ordinarily is a breach of his official bond, rendering the sureties thereon liable;[50] but a breach of the bond cannot be predicated on a failure to make a sale which the officer could not have legally made,[51] as where the execution was void,[52] or where the property is exempt[53] or does not belong to defendant in the process under which it was seized,[54] nor can any liability be founded on a failure to sell which was due to a lack of bidders[55] or to an injunction against the sale.[56] It has also been held that an officer is not guilty of a breach of his bond in failing to sell attached property in his possession under an order of condemnation directing such sale unless a legal demand has been made on him for an execution of the order.[57]

Failure to execute deed The failure of a sheriff or constable who has sold real estate under execution to make and tender a deed to the vendee is a breach of his official bond, and his sureties are liable therefor, whether such failure is the result of a corrupt intention[58] or mere neglect[59]

b. Particular Matters Affecting Liability

The liability of sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable for neglect of duties or misconduct in connection with the sale of property under process is not affected by the irregularity or invalidity of the order under which such process issued or by the absence of malice on the part of the officer, but the sureties have been held not liable for failure to sell property where the process was withdrawn by the plaintiff; and want of authority to execute the process has been held to relieve the sureties.

The liability of sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable for the officer's wrongful sale of property under process is not affected by the irregularity or invalidity of the order or judgment under which such process issued,[60] and absence of malice on the part of a sheriff or constable in making a wrongful sale of property is no protection to the sureties.[61] The sureties are not liable, however, for the officer's failure to sell property levied on, or seized by, him where the execution or other process under which the levy was made is withdrawn by plaintiff therein.[62]

Want of authority to execute process. The sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable have been held not liable as for a breach of his bond for the sale of property by him under process which he was not authorized to execute;[63] but a view to the contrary has also been taken.[64]

c. Extent of Liability

The liability of the surety on the official bond of a sheriff or constable for the officer's unlawful sale or wrongful failure to sell property under process is the actual loss, which is usually measured by the value of the property.

The liability of the surety on an official bond for an unlawful sale is limited to actual losses.[65] Thus the sureties on his official bond are liable for the value of the property, provided it does not exceed the penal sum named in the bond, where a sheriff or constable sells property not belonging to defendant in the process under which he acts,[66] or property which is exempt,[67] except, as to exempt property, where the sale is regarded as absolutely void, in which case the value of the property cannot be recovered, but only actual damages and costs[68] Where an officer fails to sell property of which it was his duty to make sale, the liability of his sureties is limited to the value of such property where it is less than the amount of the debt or judgment.[69] Although a sale is declared a nullity because of the officer's default, taxes and insurance premiums paid by the purchaser cannot be recovered by him in an action on the officer's bond.[70] The liability of the sheriff on his official bond for his wrongful act extends not only to resultant losses which are direct and immediate, but to such consequential damages as, according to the common experiences of men, are likely to result from such act.[71]

c. Extent of liability

a. In General

The sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are liable thereon for the failure of the officer to account for, or pay over to the person entitled thereto, money coming into his official custody, or for his misapplication, improper distribution, conversion, or embezzlement thereof, as well as for his exaction of excessive payment, or failure to collect money which it was his duty to collect and which he might have collected if he had acted with reasonable diligence.

constable are liable thereon for the failure of the officer to account for, or pay over to the person entitled thereto, money collected by him under process or otherwise coming into his official custody[72] except where the person so entitled permits the officer to retain such money, in which case it becomes a loan to the officer, for which the sureties are not liable[73] There is a breach of the official bond of a sheriff or constable, rendering the sureties thereon liable, where he misapplies or improperly distributes or disposes of the proceeds of a sale made by him[74] or other money coming into his hands in his official capacity,[75] or where he converts or embezzles money received by virtue of his office,[76] unless, it has been held, he has other money to the same amount ready to be paid to the person entitled thereto.[77] Where an officer who has sold property so mingles and mixes the proceeds with his own funds that after his death his administrator cannot distinguish the one from the other, such disposition of the money is equivalent to a conversion, and a breach of his official bond, for which his sureties are liable,[78] but where the parties have by agreement taken attached property out of the custody of the law, and authorized the officer to sell it without reference to the legal proceedings, an appropriation by him of the funds arising from the sale is a breach of private trust, and not an act of official misconduct giving rise to a liability on his official bond[79] The fact that money was collected or received before the execution of the bond does not affect the liability of the sureties for a subsequent or continuing refusal to pay it over to the person entitled to receive it;[80] and, a fortiori, the fact that an execution was delivered to an officer before his bond was executed does not relieve his sureties of liability for money afterward received thereon[81]

Exaction of excessive payment. Where a sheriff or constable authorized to collect or receive money exacts from the debtor a greater sum than is lawfully required, there is such a breach of his duty as to render liable the sureties on his official bond[82]

Failure to collect. The sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are liable for the failure of such officer to collect money which it was his duty to collect and which he might have collected if he had acted with reasonable diligence,[83] but such sureties are not liable for an officer's failure to make a collection where it was not his official duty so to do[84]

b. Particular Matters Affecting Liability

Under the circumstances of the particular case, the liability of the surety on the official bond of a sheriff or constable for default of the officer with respect to the collection, custody, or disposition of money has been held affected, or not affected, by the officer's authority to collect or receive payment, and by various other matters.

The sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are not responsible for the officer's misapplication or conversion of money which he had no official authority to receive.[85] Thus, where an officer collects money without legal process of any kind, his sureties are not liable therefor[86] unless the statute subjects them to such liability,[87] and where an officer sells property taken on attachment by agreement between plaintiff and defendant, and without an order of court, his sureties are not liable on their bond for his failure to pay over the money.[88] Similarly, the sureties are not liable for the loss or misapplication of anything other than lawful money received by an officer as payment of a debt or claim, in the absence of any authority from the creditor to receive payment in a medium other than money.[89] In view of the rule stated supra § 178 that sureties are liable for a wrongful act done by an officer under color of office, it has been held that the surety is liable for moneys collected by the officer under color of his office, and for which he failed to account, even though he was not in fact authorized to collect the money.[90]

Sureties on the official bond of an officer are not liable for his failure to pay over or account for money paid to him by an execution debtor after the return day of the execution[91] except where by statute their liability has been extended to cover such a default[92] and except where such money is paid to release property which was levied on before the return day and is in the officer's possession,[93] or where the money is realized by a sale after the return day of property levied on before that time[94]

Duty to pay over money. A breach of the official bond of a sheriff or constable cannot be predicated on his failure to pay over money unless it was his official duty to make such payment.[95]

Efforts of plaintiff to collect. The fact that, after the failure of a sheriff or constable to collect a claim put into his hands for collection, plaintiff unsuccessfully endeavors to collect it himself does not operate as a waiver of his right of action on the officer's official bond for such default.[96]

Necessity for demand. It has been held that the failure of a sheriff or constable to pay over money to the person entitled thereto does not constitute a breach of his official bond unless the person entitled has demanded the money or offered a reasonable opportunity for payment,[97] but that a demand is not necessary before the bringing of an action founded on an officer's failure to account for money collected for public purposes.[98]

Nonenforcement of officer's liability for deputy's default. The fact that a sheriff or constable has not paid or been compelled to pay the amount collected by his deputy on execution to the person entitled thereto does not relieve the sureties on the deputy's official bond from liability for a failure or refusal of such deputy to pay over such money to the officer.[99]

Nonreceipt of money. Where a sheriff or constable has sold property under an execution or order of court, neither he nor his sureties can be allowed to show, in an action on his official bond for failure to pay over the money raised by such sale, that he has not received the purchase money, since it was his duty to receive it when the sale was made.[1] In an action on the bond of an officer for his conversion of a bank draft or check given him in payment of a debt for the collection of which process had been levied by him, it is no defense that he was not paid in money, since the injured person is entitled to treat the draft or check as money after its acceptance as such by the officer.[2]

Order to bring money into court. An order directing a sheriff or constable who has money in his custody to bring it into court furnishes no defense to an action on his official bond for such money unless it has been brought into court pursuant to such order;[3] but where an officer properly brings money into court, pursuant to its direction, no liability can be imposed on him or his sureties for failing to pay it over to plaintiff pending the further order of the court.[4]

Order to lend money. It has been held that where a court orders a sheriff or constable, as its agent, to lend money in his custody, the sureties on the official bond of such officer are not responsible for the faithful execution of the personal trust thus imposed[5] unless he does not comply with the provisions of such order as to the person to whom or mode in which the loan shall be made.[6]

Ownership of property from which money realized In an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable for his failure to pay over or account for the proceeds of property sold under execution, the officer or his sureties cannot be heard to deny that such property belonged to the execution defendant.[7]

Payment of debt. In an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable who has collected money on an execution, the right of plaintiff to the money cannot be disputed on the ground that the judgment was satisfied by a recovery and satisfaction in another case founded on the same cause of action;[8] but payments by the debtor to execution creditors are a defense pro tanto to an action on an officer's bond for failure to collect the execution.[9] If an officer pays to plaintiff the amount of an execution then in force in his deputy's hands, and the latter afterward collects it from defendant in execution, the deputy's sureties are liable on their bond if he fails to account for it;[10] and, where a deputy has neglected to pay over money collected on an execution, the sureties on his official bond are not relieved from liability to the officer by the fact that, on being sued, the latter paid the money voluntarily without defending the suit.[11]

Proper application of money. There is no liability on the official bond of a sheriff or constable as to money which has been properly applied or disposed of by him.[12]

Receipt or custody of money in private capacity. Where the receipt and custody of money by a sheriff or constable are in his private, rather than his official, capacity, the sureties on his official bond are not responsible for his disposition thereof.[13] The mere fact, however, that an officer authorized to receive or collect a sum of money does so at a time prior to that at which such payment is required to be made does not make the transaction a personal one or relieve the sureties from liability for his wrongful disposition of the money received.[14]

Tender and refusal. It has been held that the sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are relieved from such liability for the disposition of money in his custody where the officer tenders payment to a person entitled to receive money and such person refuses to receive it;[15] but there is also authority to the contrary.[16]

Validity of judgment or process. The sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are not relieved of liability for the loss or wrongful disposition of money received or collected by the officer under process because of an irregularity in such process or its issuance[17] or because of an error or irregularity in the rendition of the judgment on which such process is based.[18] Accordingly, although it has been said that a sheriff's sureties are not liable for the wrongful seizure or detention of money where he did not act under valid process,[19] there is authority to the effect that the validity of the process[20] or judgment[21] is not subject to attack in an action on the bond.

Validity of sale by which money realized. In an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable for his failure to pay over the proceeds of an execution sale of land, it may be shown in defense that the execution defendant had but an equitable title to the land which could not be sold under execution at law.[22]

c. Extent of Liability

The sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are liable for his failure to pay over or account for money to the full extent thereof with interest from the time of demand, provided such amount does not exceed the penal sum of the bond.

Provided such amount does not exceed the penal sum of the bond, the sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are liable for his failure to pay over or account for money to the full amount thereof, with interest from the time of demand.[23]

Liability of deputy's sureties to officer. A sheriff or constable who has been held liable for a default of his deputy in failing to pay over money collected or received by him is entitled to recover from such deputy's sureties only the amount of the judgment rendered against the officer, and not the amount of interest or costs which he may have been compelled to pay in addition thereto;[24] nor are the deputy's sureties liable for more than the amount of money which the deputy has received and failed to pay over, although judgment for a greater sum has been recovered against the officer.[25]

a. Abuse or Excess of Authority

The sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are liable for injuries resulting from his acts in abuse or excess of authority while attempting to execute some official duty.

If a sheriff or constable, while attempting to execute some duty of his office, abuses or exceeds his authority, or executes it in an unlawful manner, to the injury of another, the sureties on his official bond are liable therefor.[26]

b. Acts with Respect to Indemnity

Sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are liable for the failure of the officer to preserve and account for money deposited with him as indemnity except under some circumstances where the statute permitting indemnity to be taken requires it to be in the form of a bond or other prescribed security.

Sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are liable for the failure of the officer to preserve and account for money deposited with him as indemnity[27] except where the statute permitting indemnity to be taken requires it to be in form of a bond or other prescribed security, in which case it has been held, under the rule, recognized in some jurisdictions, as discussed supra § 178 g, that an officer's sureties are liable only for acts done by him virtute officii and not for those done merely colore officii, that the taking of a deposit of money as indemnity imposes no liability on the sureties for its safekeeping or return.[28]

c. Assault and Battery

A liability arises on the official bond of a sheriff or constable where, in connection with the discharge of a duty of his office, he commits an assault and battery, but not where the assault is a personal tort.

28. Neb—Comstock-Castle Stove Co. v. Caulfield, supra.

A liability arises on the official bond of a sheriff or constable where, in connection with the discharge of a duty of his office, he commits an assault and battery[29] or where in overcoming resistance to the exercise of his duty he so exceeds his authority as to become the aggressor in an assault and battery, to the injury of another[30] An officer is guilty of a personal tort, however, for which his sureties are not liable where, without necessity or provocation, he assaults a person not a party to the process he is serving or about to serve[31] or where he had no process to execute and was not attempting to make an arrest at the time of the assault.[32] Where the condition in the bond requiring faithful execution of the office is limited to specific duties enumerated in the bond relative to the execution of process and payment of fees, the bond affords no basis for recovery by one whom the sheriff wounded while acting in his official capacity.[33]

Unlawful or careless use of weapons. A deputy sheriff selected for police duty is not a deputy who actually collects taxes within the meaning of a statute making the bondsman of such deputy liable for the unlawful or careless use of certain weapons, even though he has served court papers and assisted with finances in the sheriff's office;[34] but the fact that a deputy was not a tax collecting deputy within the meaning of such statute does not preclude the maintenance of a suit on his bond because it does not expressly cover the careless or unlawful use of a weapon[35] Where the condition imposed by statute upon the official bond of a constable, subjecting him and his sureties to liability for the unlawful or careless use of weapons, is not restricted in its operation to the county of the officer's appointment, recovery thereunder does not depend on whether the unlawful or careless use of such weapon was in the course of official duty.[36]

d. Costs and Expenses of Litigation

It has been held that the sureties on the official bond of a sheriff, constable, or deputy may be compelled to respond for the costs and expenses of litigation which has resulted from the default of the officer.

The sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable may be compelled to respond for the costs and expenses of litigation which has resulted from the default of the officer,[37] but there is also authority, to the contrary, that they cannot be held liable for the costs of an action against the officer to which they were not parties.[38] Similarly, sureties on the official bond of a deputy have been held liable to his principal for expenses incurred by the officer in defending an action brought against him for an alleged default of the deputy,[39] although in at least one jurisdiction this rule has been restricted to the costs of actions in which a default on the part of the deputy was found and the officer was held liable, and not to apply where the officer was successful,[40] but it seems that the liability of the deputy's sureties does not extend to the expenses of appeals taken by the officer from a judgment against him without the consent of the deputy.[41]

e. Criminal Acts of Officer

Sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are not liable for the consequences of a criminal act, as such, of the officer, although they may be liable if the act renders the officer civilly liable.

Sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are not liable to suffer in his place for a criminal offense committed by him[42] or to indemnify individuals for consequence of a criminal act, as such.[43] Where an act of an officer renders him civilly liable, however, his sureties are not relieved of liability on the bond by the fact that such act also constitutes a crime.[44]

f. Defaults in Connection with Taking Bond or Security

Where it is the duty of a sheriff or constable to take a bond or other security, the sureties on his official bond ordinarily are liable for his failure to take a bond, or his acceptance of a bond with insufficient sureties or for an inadequate penal sum, or a bond which is informal, defective, or void.

Where it is the duty of a sheriff or constable to take a bond or other security, the sureties on his official bond ordinarily are liable for his failure to take a bond,[45] or his acceptance of a bond with insufficient sureties[46] or for an inadequate penal sum,[47] or a bond which is informal,[48] or does not contain conditions required by statute,[49] or is otherwise defective,[50] or a void bond.[51] Where, however, a statute makes an officer who fails to take bail, or takes insufficient bail, liable as special bail, it has been held that the officer does not become liable on his official bond for his failure to take bail, but is liable only as bail, and it is not until he has failed in his obligation as bail that the sureties on his official bond may be looked to;[52] but when he fails to perform his obligations as bail he becomes liable on his official bond.[53] An attempt to enforce an insufficient bond taken by an officer does not bar the remedy on his official bond for the default,[54] but in an action by attachment creditors on the official bond of the attaching officer for taking an insufficient bond in replevin for the attached property, where the replevin was not decided on the merits, but on a voluntary discontinuance of the attachment, defendant may show that the attached property was exempt.[55]

Failure to return a replevin bond has been held to constitute a breach of the officer's official bond, for which the sureties thereon are liable.[56]

Extent of liability. The measure of the amount for which sureties may be held liable for the taking of an insufficient or defective bond is the injury suffered by the person for whose benefit the bond is required, provided it does not exceed the penal sum named in the bond,[57] and their liability is not necessarily confined to the value of the property to the taking of which the bond relates.[58] No damages can be recovered against an officer's sureties for his failure to take a proper forthcoming bond where the party from whom he should have taken it was afterward discharged from liability.[59]

(2) Particular matters affecting liability
(3) Extent of liability

(1) In General

Sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable may be compelled to respond for the failure of such officer to return process within the time allowed by law therefor or the making of a false or defective return; and the officer is liable on his bond for making a false return.

Sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable may be compelled to respond for the failure of such officer to return process[60] within the time allowed by law therefor,[61] or for the making of a false return[62] or a defective one,[63] and the officer is liable on his bond for making a false return,[64] but there can be no recovery of damages not proximately resulting from such default.[65]

(2) Particular Matters Affecting Liability

Under the circumstances of the particular case, the liability of the surety on the official bond of a sheriff or constable for default of the officer with respect to the return of process has been held affected, or not affected, by the capacity in which the writ was delivered to the officer, his authority to execute it, the cause of his failure to return the process, the time of the receipt of the process, and by various other matters.

Sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are not liable for a failure on the part of such officer to return process not delivered to him in his official capacity,[66] or to return process which he was not authorized to execute,[67] or where the failure to return process was due to a providential cause beyond the officer's control[68] or to the accidental loss or misplacement thereof;[69] but the sureties on the bond are liable for the officer's failure to execute process which he was not obliged to receive, if in fact he did receive it,[70] and the fact that process was received by a sheriff or constable too late to permit its full execution before the return-day does not relieve the sureties on his official bond of liability for his failure to make a return.[71]

Abandonment of office by justice issuing process. Where, before the return-day of an execution, the justice by whom it was issued removed from the town and delivered his official docket and papers to the town clerk, and before the return-day the constable to whom the execution was delivered returned it to the town clerk, it was held that the constable and the sureties on his official bond could not be held liable for failure to return the writ to the justice.[72]

Acts of plaintiff. Where the damages suffered by plaintiff in an action for a false return of process by a sheriff or constable have resulted from his own act rather than from the false return, he cannot recover on the official bond of the officer;[73] but it is no defense to an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable for his failure to return a writ that, at the instance and request of plaintiff, the officer returned it to a county other than the one to which it was returnable on its face.[74]

Insolvency of defendant in process. Sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are not relieved from liability for the officer's failure to return an execution by the fact that when the execution came to his hands the execution defendant had no property, but was then and still continued to be insolvent;[75] but the insolvency or poverty of defendant may go in mitigation of damages[76] except where absolute liability for the amount of the debt is imposed by statute on the sureties in case of failure to return a writ.[77]

Issuance of alias writ. Where a sheriff or constable fails to return process, plaintiff therein does not relinquish his right of action on the officer's official bond by procuring the issuance of an alias writ.[78]

Nonpossession of property described in venditioni exponas. The fact that the property never came to the hands of a sheriff or constable does not excuse him from liability on his official bond for neglect to return a venditioni exponas or for making a false return thereof.[79]

Participation in making of return. Where a return of process is prepared by a sheriff or constable but signed by his deputy, the officer cannot, on being held liable for an insufficient return, recover against the deputy and the sureties on his official bond;[80] and, similarly, where an officer sees the return indorsed on process by a deputy before it is delivered into the clerk's office, and with knowledge of facts showing its falsity allows the return to be made, it is in law and fact his return, and he cannot recover on the deputy's official bond.[81] Knowledge on the part of an undersheriff, however, that a return made by a deputy is false has been held not to be imputable to the sheriff so as to preclude a recovery by him from the sureties on the deputy's bond,[82] and an officer by whom a return is signed may recover against his deputy and the sureties on the latter's bond for damage suffered by him because of the falsity of the return, where it was prepared by the deputy or in accordance with his direction and the officer did not know of its falsity.[83]

Payment to plaintiff. The maintenance of an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable for his failure to return an execution is not barred by the fact that the execution defendant has paid the amount of the execution to plaintiff.[84]

Validity of judgment. Liability has been held not to arise on the bond of a sheriff or constable for his failure to return an execution issued on a void judgment,[85] but there is also authority for the view that the sureties cannot be permitted to show, in order to escape liability for a defective return by the officer, that the judgment was void.[86] Mere irregularities in the judgment do not relieve the sureties of liability.[87]

Validity of process. Failure on the part of a sheriff or constable to return process which is on its face void is not a breach of his official bond,[88] but the sureties on the bond are liable for a failure to return process which is merely irregular.[89]

(3) Extent of Liability

Within the limits of the penal sum named in the bond, sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are liable to the extent of the injury sustained as a result of defaults of the officer with respect to the return of process.

Subject to the rule, discussed supra § 181, that sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable may not be compelled to respond in an amount larger than the penal sum named in the bond, they are prima facie liable for a failure of the officer to return final process to the extent of the amount named in the writ,[90] or, for failure to return an attachment, to the extent of plaintiff's demand,[91] or, for failure to return a venditioni exponas, to the extent of the value of the property which was directed to be exposed to sale.[92] A recovery may be had, however, only to the extent of the injury, if any, resulting from such failure,[93] so, where the amount of an execution has been paid to plaintiff by defendant therein, no recovery of such amount can be had against the officer's sureties,[94] but where a penalty is imposed by statute for failure to make a return the sureties are liable therefor notwithstanding such payment.[95] A false return warrants a recovery on the bond of the damages proximately resulting therefrom.[96] No recovery can be had for a loss not resulting from the officer's default.[97]

iff or constable works a breach of the condition of the officer's official bond and ordinarily renders the sureties thereon liable for the actual injury which has resulted from the default.

The escape of a prisoner from the custody of a sheriff or constable works a breach of a condition of the officer's official bond that he shall faithfully perform the duties of his office.[98] The sureties are prima facie liable, in a case of civil arrest, for the amount of the debt for which the arrest was made,[99] but ordinarily their liability is limited to the actual injury which has resulted from the default,[1] although by some authorities this rule has been restricted to cases of the escape of one arrested on mesne process, and held not to apply to escape from an arrest on final process.[2] Accordingly it may be shown in mitigation of damages that the person arrested was insolvent or unable to pay all his debts,[3] or that after the escape the officer rearrested the debtor and committed him to jail,[4] except where actual injury is not the measure of damages.[5] Where the sheriff releases the prisoner on the judgment creditor's refusal to pay the debtor's lodging as required by statute, the facts do not make out a cause of action against the sheriff and his bondsmen for the escape of the prisoner.[6] The requirement of a bond in a writ of capias ad satisfaciendum does not affect liability for the release of the prisoner where the prisoner was not released on bond although inclusion of such requirement in the writ was irregular.[7] Where an officer releases or permits the escape of one convicted of crime, the sureties on his bond have been held liable for the amount of the fine imposed on the convict and the costs assessed against him.[8]

Escape of prisoner at large within jail limits under jail-limits bond. The sureties of a sheriff are not liable to a judgment creditor for the escape of an imprisoned debtor who was at large within the jail limits under a jail-limits bond where the only breach of duty was that inferred from a statute imposing absolute liability on the sheriff for what the statute deems an escape.[9]

i. Failure to Commit Prisoner

The failure or neglect of a sheriff or constable to commit one to jail in accordance with an order of commitment made in a civil or criminal proceeding renders the sureties on the officer's official bond liable to one injured by such default.

The failure or neglect of a sheriff or constable to commit one to jail in accordance with an order for commitment made in a civil proceeding renders the sureties on the officer's official bond liable to one injured by such default,[10] and a failure to commit one convicted of crime renders the officer's sureties liable for the amount of the fine and costs assessed against the convict.[11]

j. Failure to Deliver Unexecuted Process to Successor

The failure of a sheriff or constable to deliver unexecuted process to his successor has been held not to constitute a breach of his official bond.

The failure of a sheriff or constable to deliver over to his successor in office process which he has not commenced to execute has been held not to

Reasons for rule

(1) Surety on sheriff's official bond did not contract to indemnify any one for an escape except as such escape might be due to some breach of sheriff's obligation well and faithfully to perform and execute the duties of his office.—American Surety Co. of New York v. Van Gilder, C.C.A. Mich., 115 F.2d 200, certiorari denied Van Gilder v. American Surety Co. of New York, 61 S.Ct. 621, 312 U.S. 690, 85 L.Ed. 1127.

(2) It cannot be said that compliance with law which requires the sheriff to permit a prisoner to be at large on a jail-limits bond is a breach of the covenant of the official bond.—American Surety Co. of New York v. Van Gilder, C.C.A. Mich., 115 F.2d 200, certiorari denied Van Gilder v. American Surety Co. of New York, 61 S.Ct. 621, 312 U.S. 690, 85 L.Ed. 1127.

(3) Statute making sheriff liable for debt for which prisoner was committed to jail, if prisoner shall go or be at large without jail limits, is not to be read into sheriff's official bond.—American Surety Co. of New York v. Van Gilder, C.C.A. Mich., 115 F.2d 200, certiorari denied Van Gilder v. American Surety Co. of New York, 61 S.Ct. 621, 312 U.S. 690, 85 L.Ed. 1127.

(4) Custody of prisoner within jail limits is not custody of sheriff, but custody of prisoner's sureties, with respect to liability of sheriff's sureties to judgment creditor.—American Surety Co. of New York v. Van Gilder, C.C.A. Mich., 115 F.2d 200, certiorari denied Van Gilder v. American Surety Co. of New York, 61 S.Ct. 621, 312 U.S. 690, 85 L.Ed. 1127.

constitute a breach of his official bond for which his sureties are liable;[12] but there is also authority to the contrary.[13]

k. Injury Caused by Negligent Operation of Motor Vehicle

Although there is authority holding otherwise, the sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable have been held liable for an injury inflicted by the officer while using a motor vehicle in the performance, or pretended performance, of a duty imposed by law.

According to some authority the liability of the sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable for injuries inflicted by the officer while using a motor vehicle depends on whether the officer at the time was acting by virtue of his office or under color of his office,[14] rather than whether he was acting in an official capacity.[15] Thus the fact that the officer was on an official mission at the time of running his vehicle against another did not convert such act into the performance of an official duty by virtue or under color of his office,[16] and therefore it did not constitute a breach of his bond to discharge the duties of his office faithfully,[17] even though he committed a tort in negligently operating his vehicle and violating traffic regulations.[18] On the other hand, it has been held that where the officer discharged his legal duty in such negligent manner as to cause injury to another it was an official wrong for which his bond is liable,[19] and that where the officer was using a vehicle furnished by the county for the purpose of going to a place where he had reason to believe information as to a crime to be available he was engaged in a duty imposed by law.[20] With respect to liability on the bond, whether the officer was in fact performing a duty imposed by law is immaterial if he was pretending to do so.[21] If the course of the official conduct is interrupted on any account not official in its nature and during such interruption the officer wrongfully causes injury to another, it is not official misconduct for which his bond is liable,[22] but he is on official business as long as he continuously pursues a course of conduct required of him by law with respect to his office.[23]

l. Injury to Prisoner

Sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are liable for injuries to a prisoner in the custody of the officer resulting from the latter's negligence or unlawful act, but malice in performing the duties required by law affords no ground for recovery.

Sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are liable for injuries to a prisoner in the custody of the officer resulting from the latter's negligence,[24] or for his unlawful act in killing a prisoner,[25] but the mere fact that the sheriff maliciously performs the duties required of him by law and enforces the law with malice against the prisoner affords no ground for recovery on his official bond.[26]

m. Matters Relating to Collection of Taxes

Where it is a part of the official duty of a sheriff to act as collector of taxes, his official bond covers what is done or omitted by him in that capacity except where he is required to give a special bond as tax collector, in which case such bond rather than the general bond must respond.

Where it is a part of the official duty of a sheriff to act as collector of taxes, his official bond covers what is done or omitted by him in that capacity,[27] even though the duty is contingent on the failure to designate some other collector,[28] except where he is required to give a special bond as tax collector, in which case such bond, rather than the general bond, must respond.[29] Where the law does not require a special bond as tax collector, the fact that such a bond is actually given does not affect or relieve the liability of the sureties on the officer's general official bond.[30] The sureties on a bond relating or extending to the collection of taxes may be compelled to respond for the sheriff's failure to pay over or account for taxes collected by him in the performance of his duty and under authority of law;[31] but they are not liable for taxes collected by an officer without authority[32] or for a failure to collect taxes which the officer was unauthorized to collect.[33]

Bond of deputy sheriff. Where a sheriff is also collector of taxes, the sureties on the official bond of a deputy sheriff have been held liable for the defaults of such deputy in connection with the collection of taxes by him,[34] even though the sheriff is required by statute to give a special bond as collector of taxes,[35] but there is also authority for the view that the deputy's bond does not extend to his acts or defaults in collecting taxes.[36]

n. Matters Relating to Fees or Compensation

As a general rule the sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are liable for fees improperly collected by him.

As a general rule the sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are liable for fees improperly collected by him;[37] but the sureties on the bond of a de facto sheriff are not liable to the de jure sheriff, on his recovery of the office, for the fees, salary, or other emoluments of the office which were received by their principal while exercising the functions of the office.[38] The failure or refusal of a sheriff or constable to repay money voluntarily overpaid to him as fees or expenses or in settlement of his accounts is not a breach of his official bond and does not render the sureties thereon liable,[39] and the surety on the official bond of a sheriff is not liable to the county for the amount of illegal items of compensation which had been paid to the sheriff under a mistake of law honestly made by the county.[40] In an action on an officer's bond to recover for fees collected and not turned over to the county, payments made by the officer for deputy hire may be set up in defense.[41]

o. Personal Contracts of Officer

The sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are not liable for obligations of the officer which rest merely on his personal contracts

p. Wrongful Arrest or Imprisonment

Sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable may be compelled to respond for his wrongful act in arresting a person or for a wrongful imprisonment.

Sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable may be compelled to respond for his wrongful act in arresting a person,[43] where the arrest is an act virtute officii,[44] as in arresting one person under process against another,[45] or for a wrongful imprisonment.[46] Where an officer wrongfully makes an arrest without a warrant, the sureties are liable if the arrest is on a charge for which the officer is authorized to make an arrest without a warrant,[47] but not otherwise.[48] An arrest by a sheriff or constable under process void on its face is not a breach of his official bond,[49] but a mere irregularity in the process or in the complaint on which it was issued does not relieve the sureties of liability for a wrongful arrest.[50] The surety is not liable to a municipal prisoner who was received by the sheriff or his jailer outside of and beyond his mandatory authority.[51]

Justification of arrest. No liability arises on the bond of an officer for the arrest of one charged with an offense of which he was not guilty, where the officer at the time of the arrest had reasonable grounds to believe that the person arrested had committed the offense.[52] The sheriff's bondsman is not liable for damages resulting from wrongful imprisonment pursuant to an order of court directing the sheriff to take into custody and confine a person known by the sheriff to have served his full term and to have been discharged, since the sheriff was justified in obeying the order which was fair on its face.[53]

§ 190. Rights and Remedies of Sureties

A surety on a bond of a sheriff or constable is entitled to be indemnified against any liability, loss, or expense sustained in consequence of the execution of the bond where the surety and the officer have so agreed.

A surety on a bond of a sheriff or constable is entitled to be indemnified against any liability, loss, or expense sustained in consequence of the execution of the bond where an agreement between the surety and the officer to that effect is incorporated in the bond[54] or separately executed.[55] Accordingly, the surety may, under such an agreement, maintain an action against the officer to recover payments made under or pursuant to the bond,[56] such as a payment of a judgment against the officer[57] or a payment in settlement of a claim against the officer.[58] Moreover, a surety on the general official bond of a sheriff or constable against whom liability has been asserted because of the officer's failure to pay over funds collected by him is entitled to maintain an action on a special revenue bond given by the officer, to compel the sureties on such special bond to pay as much of the officer's shortage as they are liable for under their bond.[59]

The right of action of an officer's surety who has been compelled to respond for a default of the officer's deputy to sue on the deputy's bond is discussed infra § 194.

§ 191. Admissibility and Conclusiveness on Sureties of Adjudication against Officer

The authorities are not in accord as to the admissibility and conclusiveness, in an action against the sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable, of an adjudication against the officer.

The authorities are not in accord as to the admissibility and conclusiveness, in an action against the sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable, of an adjudication against the officer.[60] Thus, while it has been held in some instances that an adjudication against the officer is not evidence against the sureties in an action on the bond,[61] the more general rule appears to be that it is admissible,[62] as at least some evidence of the officer's default and the extent of his liability,[63] and it has been held to be prima facie evidence against the sureties even though they had no notice of the action or proceeding in which it was rendered.[64]

While various authorities have broadly stated as a general rule that such a judgment is,[65] or that obligors, but that, in all suits thereon against surety, liability of sheriff shall be first fixed, except when sheriff is a party to suit or has died or is not found, did not have effect of nullifying written agreement executed by sheriff in connection with, and in consideration of, plaintiff's execution as surety of sheriff's bond, whereunder sheriff indemnified plaintiff against liability under bond and authorized plaintiff to pay or compromise claims or charges —American Sur. Failure to describe officer as such in prior action

(1) The judgment has been held conclusive on the sureties even though the declaration in the action against the officer did not in terms

such a judgment is not,[66] conclusive on the sureties on the official bond, it has more specifically been held that the judgment against the officer is conclusive against the sureties where they were notified of the action in which it was rendered,[67] and not conclusive where they were not notified or afforded an opportunity to defend the action,[68] unless on a fair construction of the bond the sureties may be deemed to have undertaken to be responsible for the result of a suit against the officer.[69] It has also been held that a judgment or other adjudication against an officer is only prima facie evidence against the sureties on his bond,[70] at least where they had no notice of the action or proceeding in which it was rendered,[71] and that, at least where the sureties had no such notice, they may defend on the ground that such judgment is erroneous on the merits,[72] or that it was obtained through fraud or collusion,[73] or that the court by which it was rendered was without jurisdiction.[74]

Sureties of deputy While a judgment against a sheriff or constable for an official default of his deputy has been held not to be evidence against the sureties on the official bond of such deputy,[75] the more generally accepted rule would seem to be that such a judgment is prima facie evidence against the deputy's sureties,[76] even though they had no notice of the action in which the judgment was rendered,[77] but that it is not conclusive on them[78] except, as has been held, where they had notice of the action in which such judgment was rendered, and the deputy defended it.[79]

§ 192. Summary Proceedings on Official Bonds

a. In general
b. Considerations affecting availability of summary remedy
c Procedure

a. In General

Summary remedies for enforcing the liability of sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are available only in conformity to the statutes creating them, which statutes, being penal in nature, must be strictly construed and applied.

In accordance with statutory provisions in some jurisdictions, the liability of sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable may be enforced by summary proceedings.[80] Such summary remedies may be taken and pursued only in strict conformity to the statutes creating them,[81] which statutes, being penal in their nature,[82] must be strictly construed[83] They will not be extended beyond their terms,[84] and they will not be held to apply to de-

describe him as being such officer—Dennie v Smith, 129 Mass 143

(2) On the other hand, it has been held that, while a judgment recovered against a constable for misconduct of his official duties is conclusive against the sureties, an action against a constable and his sureties cannot be maintained on a judgment entered against the constable in proceedings to recover damages for assault and battery where the record of the first action fails to disclose that the assault and battery was committed in the course of his official duties and where it was instituted against him alone as an individual—Sopko v Esslinger, 47 Pa Dist. & Co. 155, 44 Lack Jur 221

Amount of damages

Since judgment recovered against sheriff for permitting escape was not binding on surety on sheriff's bond conditioned on faithful performance of official duties, where surety was not made party to action or served with notice therein, surety was still entitled to litigate amount of plaintiff's damages—Slagle v. Possession at expiration of term

A statute providing for summary proceedings for a sheriff's failure to faults which are not clearly provided for[85] or which were not committed by the officer in his official capacity.[86] A fortiori there can be no summary remedy against the sureties unless given by statute;[87] and a statute giving a summary remedy against an officer does not include, and will not be extended by implication to include, the right to proceed summarily against the sureties on his bond.[88] A summary remedy against sureties is cumulative merely, and does not supersede the remedy by action on the bond.[89]

Who may proceed summarily. A statute giving a summary remedy against the sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable for such officer's failure to pay over money which he has collected on execution "on demand of plaintiff" refers to the execution plaintiff and not to plaintiff in the original action, and hence is available to a defendant in whose favor judgment has been rendered.[90] An officer against whom judgment has been obtained because of the misconduct or default of his deputy may have his remedy by motion against the deputy's sureties[91] even though he has not yet paid the judgment against him.[92] The state is entitled to the benefit of the statutory remedy on the official bond of an officer for a default with respect to process issued on behalf of the state.[93]

Defaults for which summary remedies available Summary proceedings to enforce the liability of sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable have been held to be available, under statutes providing for such proceedings, for such officer's failure to serve process,[94] failure to pay a county order,[95] failure to collect money which might have been collected by the use of reasonable diligence,[96] failure to pay over money collected[97] or to account for money in his official custody,[98] failure to turn over goods in his possession to his successor,[99] loss of property in his official custody,[1] failure to settle his accounts with the county fiscal authorities,[2] failure to note on an execution the time of its delivery to him,[3] failure to return process[4] within the time prescribed by law,[5] or making a false[6] or insufficient[7] return. A summary remedy provided by statute against an officer's sureties has also been held to be available for a default of such officer's deputy.[8] However, a summary remedy is not available against an officer's sureties for his defaults occurring prior to the enactment of the statute giving such remedy.[9]

b. Considerations Affecting Availability of Summary Remedy

Particular considerations or circumstances which have been held to affect or not to affect the availability of a summary remedy against the sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable include the sufficiency of the bond, validity of the judgment or process, want of injury to the complainant, issuance of an alias writ, and the death or absence of the officer.

The effect of various circumstances on the availability of a summary remedy against the sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable has been adjudicated.[10] Sureties on the official bond of turn over to his successor in office seized goods and chattels in his possession at the expiration of his term of office has been held to be inapplicable where sheriff seizing a motor vehicle had delivered it in replevin proceeding before he went out of office—Union Motor Car Co v. 10. Judgment against officer

The recovery of a judgment against a sheriff or constable for an official default does not bar summary proceedings for the same default against the sureties on his official bond, where such judgment is unavailing—Grayham v Washington County Ct, 9 Dana, Ky., 182.
Pendency of action
The pendency of an ordinary action against a sheriff or constable and the

a sheriff or constable cannot be held liable in summary proceedings thereon where the bond is invalid or void,[11] and ordinarily a remedy by such proceedings is not available where the bond is not good as a statutory bond, the remedy, if any, in such case being by ordinary action.[12] Where a statute expressly provides, however, that a bond shall be valid and binding, although not in the statutory form, the summary remedy is available against the sureties [13] It has been held that a summary proceeding on a bond is not precluded by the fact that the bond was not registered or recorded as required by statute,[14] or that, although duly registered, it does not appear to have been accepted by the proper officers and registered by their order.[15]

Doubt as to duty. A summary remedy against a sheriff or constable and the sureties on his official bond may be available only in cases of intentional delinquency on the part of the officer,[16] and it has been held that it cannot be pursued for a failure to pay over money which was due to a well-founded doubt as to the right of the party to receive it [17]

Validity of judgment or process. On motion against a sheriff or constable and the sureties on his official bond for a neglect on the part of such officer to pay over the proceeds of sales of property, the sureties cannot object to the sufficiency of the judgment[18] or execution[19] under which the sales were made and the money received; and the fact that an execution was irregular and voidable is not any defense to a motion against an officer and his sureties for an illegal return of the same "not satisfied."[20] However, a summary proceeding for the officer's failure to proceed under execution will not lie where it appears that, prior to the proceeding, execution had been quashed and the judgment satisfied.[21]

Want of injury; receipt of money. It has been held that, since the statute authorizing summary proceedings against the officer's sureties has as its primary object a method of affording a redress for injuries,[22] one who has suffered no injury from the officer's act or omission is not entitled to recover under such statute [23] However, the fact that an execution plaintiff has suffered no injury through the official default of a sheriff or constable in connection with the execution or return of the writ does not bar summary proceedings against the officer and the sureties on his official bond for a statutory penalty for such default [24] Where plaintiff in an execution has received the money or property thereon either before or after the return of the execution, he cannot recover by motion against the sheriff or constable or the sureties on his official bond for the officer's failure to return the execution within the time prescribed,[25] but the receipt of part of the money due on an execution after the officer levying it has rendered himself liable by making an insufficient return does not preclude plaintiff from proceeding summarily against such officer and his sureties for the balance of the debt[26] and a penalty or damages given by statute.[27]

Issuance of alias writ. The mere issuance of an alias execution is not a forfeiture of the right of plaintiff therein to proceed summarily against a sheriff or constable and the sureties on his official bond for a failure to return the original execution[28] or the making of an insufficient return.[29] sureties on his official bond for an official default on the part of such officer is no bar to the prosecution of a summary remedy for another and different default, although both occurred in connection with the same process —Sanders v Commonwealth Bank, 2 Metc, Ky., 327—57 C.J. p 1048 note 48.

Liability of property to seizure and sale

On a motion under a statute against a sheriff or constable and the sureties on his official bond for the failure of such officer to make the money on an execution, it is competent for the sureties to show that property in the execution defendant's possession was not subject to levy and sale to satisfy the writ

Legality of tax levy. In summary proceedings against a sheriff, acting as tax collector, and the sureties on his official bond for moneys collected or received by such officer as taxes, defendants cannot be heard to object that the tax was not lawfully levied.[30]

Death or absence of officer. Where the rule obtains that a summary proceeding cannot be maintained against the sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable without joining the officer as a party defendant, it has been held that no summary remedy is available against the sureties of an officer who is dead[31] or who is absent from the state or beyond the reach of process,[32] an injured party being left in such case to his common-law remedy on the bond,[33] but in the absence of such rule the death of the officer does not prevent the maintenance of summary proceedings against the sureties.[34]

(1) In General

Summary proceedings against sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable ordinarily are instituted by motion for judgment.

The method of proceeding summarily against the sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable is dependent on statute.[35] Ordinarily, in accordance with statutory provisions, such proceedings are to be instituted by motion for judgment for the amount of their liability,[36] but a rule to show cause why such a judgment should not be entered has also been treated as proper.[37] Under a statute so providing, the fiscal authority of the county may issue summary execution, without serving citation or notice, against the officer and his sureties, for money collected and not accounted for by the officer,[38] and thereafter the surety may proceed in equity or by affidavit of illegality to cancel or arrest the enforcement of such execution.[39]

(2) Conditions Precedent

It may be a condition precedent to summary proceedings on the bond of a sheriff or constable that a demand be made for money in his hands, or that the liability of the officer be judicially ascertained.

A demand on a sheriff or constable for money in his hands may be a prerequisite to summary proceedings against him and his sureties on his official bond for his failure to pay over such money,[40] but where a judgment is rendered in favor of plaintiff, on a motion against an officer and his sureties, for an omission to levy an execution, the statutory penal interest from the date of the return of the process follows as of course, without a previous demand.[41] A return by a sheriff or constable admitting the receipt of money is not a condition precedent to the institution of summary proceedings against the officer and the sureties on his official bond for his failure or refusal to pay over money.[42]

Judicial ascertainment of default. It has been held that, in order to entitle a sheriff or constable to proceed summarily against a deputy and the surety on his official bond for the deputy's default, the existence of such default and the officer's liability therefor must first have been judicially ascertained,[43] and, similarly, that summary proceedings cannot be maintained against the sureties on the bond of a deceased officer until the extent of the liability of the officer's estate has become fixed by an allowance against it for the damage sustained by reason of the official misconduct of which complaint is made,[44] even though such estate is entirely insolvent.[45] the sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable may be made in the same manner and to the same extent as in an action at law.

In general, a defense to a summary proceeding against a sheriff or constable and the sureties on his official bond may be made in the same manner and to the same extent as in an action at law.[46] Thus parties sought to be charged on motion as the sureties of an officer may contest the fact of their suretyship, and introduce proof to show that they were not his securities at the time of the supposed default.[47] It is a defense to a summary proceeding to collect a debt from the officer, or his surety, for failure to return execution or for making a false return, that the judgment creditor did not suffer any injury as a result of the acts of the officer,[48] as where no money could have been collected by the officer on execution and levy by the use of proper diligence.[49] On motion against an officer and his sureties for failing to pay over money made on execution where the return shows satisfaction, a plea by a surety, which attempts on behalf and in the name of the surety, to deny the liability of the principal is bad, as such defense can be made only by the officer.[50]

Tender of amount due. In summary proceedings against a sheriff or constable on his official bond for failure to return an execution, a tender by him of the amount thereof after notice and before judgment is no defense, where a tender is not deemed a discharge of the liability.[51]

(4) Jurisdiction and Venue

Ordinarily, except where some other court is designated by statute, the court by which a judgment was rendered or process issued is the proper court in which summary proceedings should be instituted against a sheriff or constable and the sureties on his official bond for defaults in connection with such process or process issued under such judgment.

Ordinarily the court by which a judgment was rendered or process issued is the proper court in which summary proceedings should be instituted against a sheriff or constable and the sureties on his official bond for defaults in connection with such process or process issued under such judgment,[52] except where some other court is designated by the statute providing for such proceedings.[53] Two or more distinct defaults cannot be consolidated in a single proceeding for the purpose of so raising the amount in controversy as to enable the proceeding to be brought in a court which could not take cognizance of the amount involved in any one of the defaults standing alone;[54] but the court otherwise properly having jurisdiction is not deprived thereof by the fact that after affirmance on appeal the judgment aggregates a sum beyond the jurisdiction of such court.[55] It has been held that a proceeding founded on an officer's failure to return process issued by a justice of the peace who has gone out of office may be instituted before his successor.[56]

Venue. In the absence of statute providing otherwise, summary proceedings against a sheriff or constable and the sureties on his official bond should be brought in such officer's own county,[57] although the process with reference to which the default occurred was issued to him from another county.[58] Where, however, the statute requires such proceedings to be brought in the court from which the process issued, they must be brought in such court even though it is not in the county in and for which the officer acts.[59]

(5) Time for Proceeding, and Limitations

Except where provided otherwise by statute, summary proceedings against the surety on the official bond of a sheriff or constable may be brought at any time before the claim is barred by a statute of limitations.

Except where provided otherwise by statute, it is not necessary that summary proceedings against a sheriff or constable and the sureties on his official bond shall be brought at the first term of court after the default[60] or after a demand on the officer,[61] but, unless specially limited, such proceedings may be brought at any time before the claim is barred by a statute of limitations.[62] Where, however, the statute expressly limits the time within which such proceedings must be brought they cannot be instituted thereafter.[63] A motion against an officer and his sureties for his failure to return process may be made after such officer's term of office has expired.[64]

Summary proceedings are governed by the statute of limitations applicable to ordinary actions on the bond, in the absence of any other statutory provision;[65] and a statute limiting the time within which fines or penalties may be recovered does not apply[66] even though the damages recoverable by the summary remedy are specified or fixed by statute.[67]

(6) Notice

In accordance with statutory provisions notice must be given to the defendants in a summary proceeding against a sheriff or constable and the sureties on his bond; such notice must be in writing and must inform defendants with reasonable certainty of the demand to be set up and the time and place of making of the motion.

While it has been held that where the statute providing for summary proceedings against a sheriff or constable and the sureties on his official bond does not require notice, none need be given,[68] it has also been held that notice is necessary unless it is expressly dispensed with by statute.[69] Such notice as the statute requires, unless it has been waived, is essential to the jurisdiction of the court to entertain the proceedings,[70] but where an officer or surety appears in court or otherwise submits himself to its jurisdiction any want of or objection to the notice is waived by such party.[71] A notice of summary proceedings against a sheriff or constable and the sureties on his official bond, where it is required, takes the place and performs the functions of a summons or capias in an ordinary action;[72] and in accordance with the provisions of some statutes, it also performs the functions of a petition or declaration.[73]

It has been held that a motion is to be deemed abandoned unless it is made at the term indicated in the notice or some other proceeding is had at such term to keep it alive,[74] and that a judgment rendered on a motion made at a term of court subsequent to that designated in the notice is void,[75] although on the latter point there is also authority to the contrary;[76] but a motion duly made is not discontinued by the omission of plaintiff to have it formally continued to a later term.[77] Where a notice of summary proceedings against a sheriff or constable and the sureties on his official bond sets forth two or more defaults on the part of such officer but gives notice of intention to move on account of only a specified one or ones of them, it will be limited in effect to the grounds so specified.[78]

To whom notice must be given. As a general rule the notice of summary proceedings against an officer and his sureties must be given to all defendants[79] However, under a statute providing for notice to the officer "or" his sureties, notice to either has been held sufficient,[80] so that where notice is given to the officer none is necessary to the sureties,[81] or where notice is given to the sureties the officer need not be notified[82] Where the notice has not been served on all the obligors, plaintiff in the motion may discontinue the proceeding as against those not served and prosecute his motion to judgment against the other or others.[83]

and be personally served.[85] It must inform defendants as to the matters for which they are sought to be held liable,[86] but only reasonable certainty is necessary in apprising defendants of the demand intended to be set up[87] and the time when and place where the motion will be made,[88] and, in general, any notice, however informal, which informs defendants of the nature and object of the proceeding is sufficient.[89] It is not essential that the notice be dated,[90] and the notice to an officer of a summary proceeding against him and the sureties on his official bond need not state the names of the sureties.[91] The notice may be in the name of plaintiff in the motion, and need not be in the name of the state for the use of such plaintiff,[92] and it may be subscribed by plaintiff's attorney.[93] Mere surplusage in the notice or suggestion will not vitiate the proceeding.[94] One joint notice of a motion for judgment on the officer's defaults in two or more cases has been held sufficient.[95]

Sufficiency as petition or declaration. Where a notice of summary proceedings against a sheriff or constable and the sureties on his official bond performs the functions of a petition or declaration in an ordinary action, it must contain all the requisites of a declaration or petition[96] and aver every fact necessary to support a recovery.[97] Thus, where the motion is for failure to serve process, the notice must show that it was the duty of the officer to serve it,[98] and where a demand is a condition precedent to the maintenance of the proceedings the notice should aver the making thereof.[99] It is also necessary that the notice should show that plaintiff is entitled to the remedy which he seeks to enforce.[1] A notice of a motion for failure to pay over money should negative any lawful disposition thereof.[2]

A notice stating that the officer has failed to return an execution is sufficient, without an allegation that he failed to return it at the proper time,[3] and an allegaion that the execution was received by the officer in sufficient time to return it to the next succeeding term is sufficient to charge him with liability for failure to return it at such time.[4] A notice to designated persons, as sureties of an officer, of a motion against them for his failure to return an execution, is sufficient, without averring that they are in fact the sureties of such officer,[5] and a notice to one as sheriff or constable need not aver that he is such officer,[6] or, where the proceeding is founded on the default of his deputy, aver that the deputy is his deputy.[7] It has been held that a notice of a motion against an officer and his sureties for default as to certain taxes of a specified year need not state on which one of two or more bonds executed by him the motion is to be made.[8] The joinder in a notice of two distinct grounds of recovery is not a demurrable defect.[9]

(7) Parties

Summary proceedings against a sheriff or constable and the sureties on his bond ordinarily may be maintained in the name of the person injured by the officer, with the officer and all the sureties joined as defendants.

Summary proceedings against a sheriff or constable and the sureties on his official bond ordinarily may be maintained in the name of the person injured by the default of the officer, although the bond is made payable to the state.[10] It has been held that proceedings for the failure of an officer to return an order for sale and to pay over the proceeds of the property sold should be at the instance of the clerk of the court to which such order of sale was returnable, rather than that of the judge of such court,[11] but that a justice of the peace may proceed in his own name against a constable and his sureties for fees collected by the constable and not paid over.[12]

There is authority for the view that a summary proceeding to compel the payment of money collected by execution must be in the name of the execution plaintiff, and not of his assignee;[13] but, where a statute renders the officer and his sureties liable for money to the party entitled thereto, an assignee of a judgment under which money has been received or collected is the proper party to institute summary proceedings,[14] and the assignor of such judgment, having no interest in it after the assignment, is not a proper party[15]

Defendants. Ordinarily it is proper to join the sureties with the officer as defendants,[16] and it has been held that, except in so far as it is provided otherwise by statute,[17] a summary proceeding cannot be maintained against the sureties without joining the officer.[18] However, it has also been held that where the statute authorizes proceedings against the officer "or" his sureties a proceeding cannot be maintained against the officer and his sureties jointly.[19] As a general rule all the sureties must be joined as parties defendant,[20] but where one of the sureties is dead the proceedings may be brought against the officer and the remaining sureties,[21] without including the representatives of the deceased surety,[22] and, where a statute permits it, the proceeding may be instituted against such of the sureties as may have been served without joining the other or others.[23] If one of several sureties dies after the institution of the proceeding it may be discontinued as to him and maintained against the remainder,[24] and if one or more of them, having been joined, are shown to be nonresidents the proceeding may be prosecuted against the other or others only.[25]

(8) Pleading

Where the proceeding is by motion, the motion takes the place of a formal pleading; and while technical precision is not required, the motion must be tested by its sufficiency to invoke the summary proceeding.

Where the notice of summary proceedings against a sheriff or constable and the sureties on his official bond takes the place and performs the functions of a petition or declaration, no declaration is necessary,[26] and, where the proceeding is by motion, the motion takes the place of a formal pleading.[27] The fact, however, that the moving paper is in form a petition in an ordinary action, rather than a motion, as contemplated by statute, or that it is denominated a petition by the complainant, does not impair its sufficiency.[28] Technical precision and completeness in the motion are not required,[29] and an averment fairly importing an essential fact ordinarily is sufficient,[30] but it has been held that a somewhat strict construction of the allegations of the motion is justified, on the ground that the proceeding is special and summary.[31] The sufficiency of the motion or pleading must be tested by its sufficiency to invoke the summary statutory proceeding,[32] and not by its sufficiency as a pleading in an ordinary suit for damages.[33] The sufficiency of a motion as against a general demurrer is not affected by allegations set up in the answer to the motion.[34] The motion need not state the amount for which judgment is sought where, under the statute, such amount is to be fixed by a jury, within specified limits.[35] Where complainant's pleading shows that he has been perpetually enjoined from proceeding on the officer's bond, a demurrer thereto is properly sustained.[36]

Defendant's pleadings. Where a plea to a motion against an officer and his sureties goes to the default, and it is not stated by whom pleaded, it will be considered as the plea of the officer.[37] In proceedings founded on an officer's failure to return an execution, a plea that the money made thereunder was paid before notice issued has been held good, without setting forth by or to whom the payment was made;[38] and a plea of "not guilty," although said not to be the most appropriate, has been held sufficient to throw on plaintiff the burden of supporting his right to recover.[39] A plea by sureties setting up the invalidity of the bond in that it is made payable to the governor and his successors in office instead of to the state as required by statute should expressly negative the execution by them of any official bond payable to the state.[40] Unless provided otherwise by statute, it is not essential that a plea be verified.[41]

Issues, proof, and variance. In a summary proceeding against a sheriff or constable and his sureties for an official default on the part of the officer, an issue, without regard to technicality, may be made up under the direction of the court.[42] The sureties, in a proceeding against them and the officer, may litigate the question of the latter's liability.[43] A variance between the judgment stated in the notice and that proved on the trial is not fatal where not such as to mislead defendants to their prejudice;[44] but there can be no recovery where the proof adduced shows a default different from that alleged in the notice.[45] In a proceeding for the failure of an officer to pay over on demand money collected under execution, plaintiff is not required to prove that the demand was made at the time stated in the notice, but proof of a demand at any time after the official receipt of the money and before the institution of the proceeding is sufficient.[46]

(9) Evidence

General rules of evidence in civil actions are applicable in summary proceedings against a sheriff or constable and the sureties on his bond.

Rules governing presumptions and burden of proof in civil actions generally have been applied in summary proceedings against a sheriff or constable and the sureties on his bond.[47] The moving party must prove all facts necessary to support a recovery,[48] such as the fact of suretyship,[49] at least whenever it is contested,[50] but it has been held that where the sureties appear and plead it is not necessary to prove the fact of suretyship unless it is put in issue by a plea denying the execution of the bond,[51] since otherwise the appearance and defense amounts to an admission of the suretyship.[52]

Where defendants set up an affirmative defense they must prove the matters relied on.[53] It has been held that the failure of the officer to levy on property subject to execution renders him and his sure-

Conflicting presumptions

On statutory motion to recover damages for sheriff's failure to return execution before return date, presumption that circuit clerk delivered writ to sheriff with reasonable promptness was held to be neutralized by presumption that, had sheriff received writ before return-day, he would have returned it within time required, and in absence of evidence showing when writ was delivered to sheriff movant was not entitled to judgment.—W. Default in return of execution

In proceeding against sheriff for failure to return execution on its return-day, sheriff has burden of proving that judgment creditor directed withholding of execution until after return-day, and, if sheriff does not comply with established method of returning execution, sheriff has burden of establishing his excuse for such withholding.—Everett v. Duckworth, 176 So. 387, 179 Miss. 516

Statutory provision that when a fieri facias issued against a sheriff and his surety for public moneys collected and not paid over the burden is on defendants to show that the fieri facias is invalid in whole or in part, was not changed by statute providing that on trial of case, whether in equity or on an affidavit of illegality, burden of proof shall be on the official issuing execution, but that such execution shall be prima facie evidence of the facts therein recited.—U. S. Fidelity & Guaranty Co. v. Toombs County, 1 S. E. 2d 411, 187 Ga. 544.

ties prima facie liable to the execution creditor for the full amount of his debt, interest, and costs,[54] and the burden is on defendants to overcome such prima facie liability[55] by showing justification for failure to enforce the execution or that no injury resulted to the judgment creditor by reason of such default,[56] such as by showing that nothing could have been collected on such execution by proper official diligence.[57]

The general rules with respect to the admissibility[58] and the weight and sufficiency[59] of evidence are applicable in summary proceedings on the bond of a sheriff or constable.

(10) Trial, Judgment, and Review

There is no right to a jury trial in summary proceedings on the official bond of a sheriff or constable, except in so far as provided by statute. General rules governing judgments and the review thereof in civil actions are applicable.

Sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are not, as a matter of constitutional right, entitled to a jury trial before judgment may be rendered against them in summary proceedings,[60] and a statute authorizing such proceedings is therefore not invalid because it fails to provide for a trial of the issues by jury.[61] Where, however, the statute provides for a jury trial, the court is without authority to hear and decide the proceeding without a jury.[62] Where trial is had to a jury, the general rules respecting the necessity and propriety of instructions are applicable.[63] General rules as to instructions apply also in a proceeding in equity by the officer's surety to cancel a summary execution against the officer and his surety for public money collected and not accounted for.[64] A motion against an officer and his sureties for an official default may be tried and judgment rendered on a day of the term subsequent to that for which it was docketed for trial.[65]

Verdict and findings. In order to support a judgment against defendants in summary proceedings on the official bond of a sheriff or constable the verdict should not only find the officer's default, but also negative any defense interposed by plea.[66] In proceedings founded on an officer's failure to pay over money, a finding that such money was received by the officer is necessary to support a judgment against defendants[67] unless such receipt is a matter of record.[68]

Judgment. In accordance with general rules governing judgments in civil actions, a judgment cannot be rendered in summary proceedings on the official bond of a sheriff or constable for a default other than that specified in the motion or notice.[69] A judgment for not returning an execution must show in whose favor the execution issued,[70] and in at least one jurisdiction it is held that in all cases the judgment must set forth the existence of a state of facts authorizing the exercise of the jurisdiction of the court[71] except in the case of judgments rendered in the supreme court on appeal.[72] Where two or more defaults are involved in the same proceeding, a separate judgment should be rendered for each.[73] A judgment against an officer and his sureties is valid as to the officer although void as to the sureties because their liability had terminated at the time of the default on which the judgment is based[74] The fact that a judgment is in favor of a firm or partnership instead of the individual members thereof is only matter in abatement and not cause for error.[75]

A judgment by default must show affirmatively every fact necessary to give the court summary jurisdiction,[76] and must also show the facts on which the liability of defendants depends,[77] and that every material averment of the moving papers was proved.[78]

Judgment should be entered in summary proceedings against a sheriff or constable and the sureties on his official bond for the amount for which they have become liable by reason of the act or misconduct on which the proceedings are based.[79] It has been held that interest cannot be allowed in summary proceedings on the amount for which an officer and his sureties have become liable[80] except where the statute expressly provides therefor,[81] but the contrary rule has also been applied.[82] Under some statutes the officer's failure to levy execution for a judgment debt or his making of a false return thereon warrants recovery against him and his sureties in the full amount of the debt, interest, and costs.[83]

In computing the penalty or additional damages under statutes which provide for the recovery of a prescribed per cent of the amount for which the officer and his sureties have otherwise become liable as a penalty or additional damages, only the amount for which the officer's default has rendered defendants liable is to be included, and not any interest on such amount accrued since the date of the default,[84] but, on the other hand, the statutory per cent is to be taken of the whole amount of the liability arising out of the default, undiminished by any payments subsequently made on account thereof[85] It has been held that damages provided for by statute at the rate of a specified per cent per month cannot be recovered where, without excuse for delay, an unreasonable period of time is allowed to pass before instituting proceedings therefor.[86] Where the statute prescribes one penalty for a failure to return process within a specified time after the return day, and a greater penalty for a further delay, judgment may be rendered only for the lesser penalty where the moving papers do not show how long the return was delayed.[87]

Review. Rules governing the review of judgments in civil actions generally have been applied to the review of judgments in summary proceedings against a sheriff or constable and the sureties on his official bond[88] Thus, on appeal from a judgment rendered in summary proceedings against a sheriff or constable and the sureties on his official bond, it will be presumed, in the absence of a bill of exceptions, that all the necessary facts recited in the judgment were supported by sufficient evidence.[89] The admission of incompetent evidence will not cause the reversal of a judgment supported by competent evidence, where the trial court decided matters both of fact and of law without the intervention of a jury[90] Where the officer alone has appealed from a judgment against him and his sureties, he cannot object that there is no evidence of the execution of a bond with his codefendants as sureties.[91] On appeal from a judgment entered by default, the objection that the sureties were not served with proper notice is available where the contrary does not appear of record,[92] but under a statute which does not provide for notice, a recital in the judgment that due notice was given of the motion is sufficient on appeal to show a determination by the court that a reasonable notice had been given, and to sustain the court's jurisdiction and the validity of the judgment.[93]

§ 193. Actions on Official Bonds

Statutes relating to actions on the bond or on the recognizance of a sheriff or constable must be complied with.

Statutes relating to the prosecution of an action on the bond or on the recognizance of a sheriff or constable must be complied with.[94] It has been held that the statutes of the state in which the officer's bond was given, prescribing the method in which the rights of an injured party may be enforced on the bond, create substantive and not remedial rights,[95] so that compliance with the provisions of such statutes is a prerequisite to the maintenance of an action on the bond in another state.[96]

§ 194. —— Right and Grounds of Action

As a general rule, any person injured or affected by an act or omission of a sheriff or constable for which the sureties on his official bond are liable is entitled to maintain an action on the bond; but, ordinarily, only a sheriff or constable has a right of action on the bond of such officer's deputy.

As a general rule, any person injured or affected by an act or omission of a sheriff or constable for which the sureties on his official bond are liable is entitled to maintain an action on the bond,[97] provided damage has resulted to him from the breach.[98] An action for a mere default or omission, however, as distinguished from active misconduct, cannot be maintained by one to whom the officer owed no duty with respect to the matter in connection with which the default occurred.[99] Each individual who is injured must sue separately,[1] and there cannot be a recovery by a plaintiff for himself and also for another in whose right or injury he has no

Commonwealth or individual aggrieved by misconduct of sheriff may institute action on recognizance against sheriff and his surety and obtain judgment thereon.—Commonwealth, to Use of Blystone v. Davis, 186 A. 382, 122 Pa. Super. 280.

Persons held entitled to maintain action

(1) Under a statute so providing, a right of action may arise in favor of an execution plaintiff against a sheriff and the sureties on his official bond for a breach of duty by the officer in surrendering to a claimant property levied on under the execution without requiring a forthcoming bond.—Trulock v. Lamb, 157 S.E. 100, 42 Ga. App. 601.

(2) Mortgagee under chattel mortgage on truck who had taken possession of truck and stored it with motor company had sufficient interest in truck to maintain conversion action against sheriff and sheriff's surety for wrongful taking of truck from motor company's possession.—Universal Credit Co. v. Gosney, 46 N.E. 2d 305, 70 Ohio App. 379.

(3) Corporation, although having registered office outside town, was held entitled to enforce bond of town constable running to inhabitants of town.—Town of Irvington v. Dubrow, 161 A. 351, 10 N.J. Misc. 804.

Persons held not entitled to maintain action

(1) One who brought statutory actions to foreclose liens on chattels, and obtained judgments declaring that he had liens, was not the "owner" and could not maintain action against sheriff and surety for wrongful taking of the chattels.—Stauble v. McCloskey, 59 N.Y.S.2d 811, affirmed 59 N.Y.S.2d 900, 269 App. Div. 1048.

(2) Person whose only interest in property was based on claim arising out of alleged agreement that owner was to pay him rent for being allowed to leave articles in building rented by party was held not to have sufficient interest in property to entitle him to maintain action against constable and sureties on his bond for value of property sequestered on constable's failure to return property on dismissal of owner's suits.—Bordelon v. Philbrick, 84 S.W.2d 710, 125 Tex. 460.

interest.[2] Where a bond is payable to the governor for the time being and his successors, the right to sue vests in the successor, and not in the personal representatives of a deceased governor,[3] but, where the bond runs to a designated person in his individual capacity and not as governor, an action may be maintained by the obligee's personal representative.[4] The mere fact that an action on an officer's bond for failure to make the money on an execution is brought for the use of one other than the judgment creditor does not defeat the action as showing an illegal transfer of the right of action.[5]

In some jurisdictions the right to sue on a sheriff's bond is derived from express statutory authority only,[6] and the action can be maintained by third persons only for the defaults specified in the statute.[7] It has been held that, where the statute provides a remedy for the county's recovery of fees collected by the sheriff and not paid over to the county, an action at common law cannot be maintained.[8]

In general, an action may be brought and maintained against the sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable for such default only on the part of the officer as would entitle plaintiff to recover against the officer in an action on the case,[9] but whenever there has been such an official misfeasance or default as constitutes a breach of the condition of the bond, an action thereon will lie.[10] In the absence of statute otherwise providing, one injured by an act or default of a sheriff or constable by whom a bond of indemnity has been taken is not restricted to his remedy on such bond, or precluded by the giving of such indemnity from resorting to the officer's official bond.[11] Where a claim against a sheriff's sureties is based on the ownership of property which was attached in connection with a suit to which claimant was a party, claimant must assert such claim to the property in such suit, rather than by independent action on the sheriff's bond.[12]

Sufficiency of bond An action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable is not precluded by the fact that the bond does not contain all the specific conditions required by statute, where the condition inserted in the bond, and to which the breach is assigned, is broad enough to cover them all, or at least the act of malfeasance complained of.[13]

Assignment of right of action While a right of action of an execution plaintiff against a sheriff and the sureties on his official bond for surrendering seized property without requiring a forthcoming bond may be assignable,[14] a right of action thus arising does not pass by a mere subsequent assignment of the execution itself.[15] Where an officer pays over only a part of the money collected by him on an execution, and a surety of the judgment debtor, not knowing that there is any more money in the officer's hands, pays the balance, such payment does not impair the creditor's remedy against the officer, but operates as an equitable assignment of the claim to the debtor's surety, for which he may pursue the officer on his official bond.[16]

Waiver of right of action. A right of action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable may be waived by conduct inconsistent with an intention to assert it.[17]

stable,[19] or his personal representatives,[20] has a right of action on the official bond of his deputy, except that a surety of the principal officer who has been compelled to respond for a default of the deputy may sue on the latter's bond.[21] The fact that a judgment rendered against an officer for his deputy's default has been paid by the officer's sureties rather than by him does not preclude him from maintaining an action on the deputy's bond.[22]

§ 195. —— Nature and Form of Action in General

As a general rule, an action to enforce the liability of a surety on the official bond of a sheriff or constable is ex contractu and not ex delicto.

As a general rule, the liability of a surety on the official bond of a sheriff or constable, and an action to enforce such liability, is ex contractu and not ex delicto,[23] although the default on which the liability is founded may constitute a tort.[24] An action on the bond against the officer and the surety jointly,[25] and even an action on the bond against the officer himself,[26] is in contract, but an action directly against the officer for damages resulting from his trespass or other tort, in which the surety on the bond is joined, may be in tort, even though the liability of the surety is based on contract.[27]

Apart from any summary remedies given by statute, as discussed supra § 192, the liability of the sureties can ordinarily be enforced only by an action on the bond itself;[28] and the proper form of action has been held to be debt on the penalty, where the action is brought in the name of the obligee,[29] although assumpsit has also been regarded as proper in such case;[30] and covenant has been held proper where the action is brought in the name of the person injured by the breach.[31] The liability of the sureties on the recognizance of an officer may be enforced either by an action of debt or assumpsit, or a scire facias sur recognizance.[32]

A suit in equity may be brought where the facts present the elements of equity jurisdiction.[33] So, a suit in equity may be maintained on the ground of discovery and accounting, against an officer and two or more sets of sureties on different bonds where, from the manner in which the officer's business has been carried on and his accounts kept, it is difficult to determine the liabilities as between the respective bonds.[34] However, the facts that an officer, after collecting money on execution, has died insolvent without paying it over, and that there has been no administration on his estate, do not give equity jurisdiction of a suit against his sureties;[35] and in an action founded on an officer's

Unlawful use of pistol or revolver
Under a statute providing that sheriffs, constables, and their deputies shall be liable on their official bonds for all costs and damages accruing to anyone because of their careless or unlawful use of a pistol or revolver, a person injured by a deputy's unlawful use of such weapon has a right of action on the bond given by such deputy to his principal officer—Hatfield v. refusal to sell land claimed to have been fraudulently conveyed by the judgment debtor, the tendering of an issue as to the title to the land does not make the matter one solely of equitable cognizance, since, if the conveyance was fraudulent, it passed nothing.[36]

Election of remedy. Where a sheriff or constable has taken an insufficient bail bond, and plaintiff has elected to hold the officer and his sureties liable as bail, he is concluded by the remedy so chosen and cannot resort to the officer's official bond.[37] Under a statute so providing, an injured person who claims damages from a sheriff for the acts of his deputy may, at his option, bring suit on the deputy's bond instead of the sheriff's bond,[38] but he may not sue on both.[39] It has been held that, when one damaged by an officer's default elects to avail himself of any other remedy before proceeding on the bond, he must proceed therein to final judgment and execution before he can maintain an action on the bond.[40]

§ 196. —— Single or Successive Actions

Whether successive actions by different persons or for different defaults may be maintained on the bond of a sheriff or constable until the penalty of the bond is exhausted, or whether there may be only one action, is ordinarily dependent on statute.

Where a person injured by an official default of a sheriff or constable is authorized by statute to institute an action against such officer on his official bond for the amount of his damage, each injured person may maintain a separate action for his own benefit,[41] so that successive actions for different defaults or by different persons may be maintained on an officer's bonds, and recovery had therein, until the penalty of the bond is exhausted.[42] Under a statute, however, providing, either expressly,[43] or by implication,[44] that judgment shall be entered for the full penalty of the bond, or, it has been held, in the absence of statute otherwise providing,[45] only one action may be brought on a bond; and in such case judgment for the full amount of the penalty may be entered for the benefit of all parties interested in the enforcement of the bond, as considered infra § 206.

Bond executed prior to enactment of statute is not within the statutory requirement.—Mt. Vernon Independent Graded School Dist v. Clark, 135 S W 2d 892, 281 Ky 230
Constructive notice
The statutory provision as amended that neither sheriff nor sureties on sheriff's bond shall be liable for sheriff's default unless notice of default giving rise to a claim on such bond should have been given to the sureties within certain time manifests legislative intent that constructive notice is not sufficient, and, hence, the filing and recording of settlement showing that sheriff owed a certain balance were not "notice" to plaintiff therein is not obliged to quash such bond before he may have recourse to the official bond of such officer for taking the insufficient security.[49]

It has been held that, where authority is given by statute to one injured by the official default of a sheriff or constable to sue on his official bond in the name of the public officer who is the nominal obligee thereof, the authority or consent of such obligee is not a prerequisite to the institution of such a suit,[50] and the same rule has been held to apply where the municipality is named as the obligee,[51] but under a statute providing that on a breach of the condition of the official bond of a sheriff or constable it "shall be assigned by the governor to the party or parties injured, who may maintain an action thereon in their own name," no action can be instituted on the officer's bond, in the name of the governor, for another's use, without an assignment of the bond by the governor to the person injured.[52]

b. Proceedings as to Officer's Liability

As a general rule, in the absence of a statute otherwise providing, it is not a prerequisite to the maintenance of an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable that the default or misconduct relied on as a breach, and the liability of the officer therefor, shall first be established in a separate action or proceeding against the officer alone.

Except where otherwise provided by statute, either expressly or by implication,[53] it is not a prerequisite to the maintenance of an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable that the default or misconduct relied on as a breach, and the liability of the officer therefor, shall first be established in a separate action or proceeding against the officer alone, or adjudicated against him,[54] and the injured person may, at his option, either sue directly on the bond or proceed first against the officer.[55] It has been held, however, that even in the absence of statute relating thereto, a court has the power to stay the prosecution of an action against the officer's surety pending a determination of a tort action against the officer.[56] Where the liability of the officer is required to be fixed before proceeding against the sureties, a judgment against him in an action to which he was a party is necessary.[57] A judgment for nominal damages and costs in an action of replevin for goods seized establishes the officer's misfeasance;[58] but a judgment against an officer in assumpsit does not establish his official delinquency so as to permit recovery against his sureties.[59]

Ascertainment of amount of liability. The ascertainment of the amount of the liability of a sheriff or constable for an official default is not a condition precedent to an action therefor on his official bond,[60] except where the statute otherwise provides.[61] Where such ascertainment is required, a judgment by default in an action of trover against an officer for the value of goods taken by him is sufficient.[62]

Suit against officer on notice from surety. Under a statute so providing, claimant, on written notice to that effect from the officer's surety, is required to commence and prosecute legal proceedings against the officer within a period specified in the statute,[63] and, if claimant fails to do so, the surety is discharged from liability.[64]

tions, under statutes so providing, one damaged by the official misconduct or default of a sheriff or constable must exhaust his remedy against the officer before proceeding against the sureties on his official bond;[65] but in the absence of any such statute the exhaustion of any other remedies which a party may have is not a condition precedent to an action on the officer's bond,[66] although, if such party does institute or prosecute another remedy, he must proceed to final judgment and execution therein before he can resort to the bond.[67] However, it has been held to be a principle of law, apart from statute, that one does not have a right of action against a constable's surety until after he has used reasonable diligence to collect his damages from the principal by legal process.[68] It has been held that, where the remedy against the officer is required to be exhausted, the return nulla bona of an execution against an officer,[69] or against the personal representative of a deceased officer,[70] is sufficient to entitle plaintiff therein to proceed against the sureties; but there is also authority, to the contrary, that such return does not of itself establish the insufficiency of the officer's property so as to authorize an action on his bond.[71] Under a statute providing that action on the officer's bond may be brought if judgment is recovered against the officer and execution thereon is returned wholly or partly unsatisfied, it has been held that a return of execution unsatisfied is a condition precedent to the surety's liability,[72] and that an action brought prior to such return is premature.[73]

c. Demand

A demand on a sheriff or constable for the payment over of or accounting for money collected or received by him is ordinarily a condition precedent to a right of action on his official bond.

A demand on a sheriff or constable for the payment over of or accounting for money collected or received by him is ordinarily a condition precedent to a right of action on his official bond,[74] except where the officer is dead,[75] or out of the state,[76] or has been ascertained to be insolvent,[77] or where it was his duty to pay the money into court,[78] or he has been ordered by the court to pay it over to a designated person,[79] and, except, it has been held, in the case of money collected for public purposes.[80] A demand on a deputy who has collected money will sustain an action on the bond of his principal for failure to pay over the same.[81] An action founded on a failure to collect may be maintained against an officer on his bond without a previous demand.[82]

For payment by sureties A demand for payment of the amount claimed need not be made on all the sureties on a constable's bond before suit is filed thereon.[83]

For property. A demand on a sheriff or constable for the return of property wrongfully levied on or seized,[84] or wrongfully withheld,[85] by him is not a prerequisite to an action against the sureties on his official bond for such misconduct or default; and the right to maintain an action on the officer's bond for the wrongful release of property seized or levied on is not dependent on a previous demand for such property.[86] However, it has been held that, where the officer did not know that an attachment by him was wrongful, as where he did not know that the property attached was not subject to attachment, claimant's cause of action does not accrue until he makes a demand for the possession of the property and the sheriff refuses to comply with the demand.[87]

For execution of process. It has been held that no action may be maintained on the official bond of a sheriff or constable for his failure to execute process unless a demand has been made on him for its execution [88]

For copy of process. Under a statute providing that no action shall be brought against a sheriff or constable for anything done under process until demand has been made and refused for a copy thereof, such demand is a condition precedent to the right of action.[89]

For return of process. A demand for the return of process placed in the hands of a sheriff or constable for execution is not a prerequisite to an action on his official bond after the return day for failure to make a return,[90] but under a statute making a sheriff or constable liable for a failure to return a fee bill, on demand, to the person entitled thereto, a demand is a condition precedent to an action on his official bond for failing to make such return [91]

d. Leave of Court

Under statutes so providing, leave of court must be obtained before action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable may be brought; and the grant of such leave is discretionary with the court and may be made subject to conditions.

In the absence of a statute otherwise providing, an action may be instituted and maintained on the official bond of a sheriff or constable without applying for or obtaining leave from any court so to do,[92] but, where required by statute, leave of court must be obtained before such action may be brought [93] Leave to sue may be granted on an ex parte application,[94] and notice to the officer or his sureties is not essential.[95] The application must show affirmatively that the officer has been guilty of some default or misconduct[96] in his official capacity,[97] and that any conditions precedent to a right of action have been complied with [98]

Discretion of court. The granting or refusing of leave to sue on a bond, where such leave is required, is discretionary with the court,[99] and the court may grant leave to sue provided certain terms or conditions are met [1] It has been held, in the exercise of such discretion, that leave should not be granted until it is shown that the officer is individually unable to respond in damages for the default complained of, even though a prior recovery against the officer or the exhaustion of remedies against him is not a statutory prerequisite to the institution of an action on his bond.[2] In accordance with statutory provisions, the court on proper facts may exercise a discretionary power to vacate an ex parte order permitting such action to be maintained,[3] and the court may provide that the order granting leave to sue shall be vacated unless plaintiff agrees to certain conditions.[4]

§ 198. —— Defenses

Where the act or default on which an action on the bond of a sheriff or constable is based is within the terms of the bond, the availability of a defense in such action is determined by the availability of such defense in an action against the officer alone.

Any defense which would be available to a sheriff or constable in an action against him alone is available to his sureties in an action on his official bond;[5] and, conversely, where the act or default on which the action is founded is within the terms of the bond, the sureties can make no defense which the officer could not make in an action against

Particular matter held defense

In action by execution creditor against sheriff and the surety on his official bond to recover damages for sheriff's failure to sell property levied on under the execution, it was a good defense that the execution creditor failed to advance moneys sufficient to discharge the fees of the printer for publishing the notice of sale on demand therefor by the sheriff.—Smith v. Hanson, 293 N.W. 551, 70 N.D. 241, 129 A.L.R. 1356.

Credit allowance

In action against sheriff and his sureties for amount sheriff, without authority, paid to claimants against estate from money obtained on execution, sheriff and sureties were held entitled to credit for amount sheriff was prevented from paying to estate by an attachment of the money, by estate's creditor, as against contention that credit should have been allowed only as of date sheriff paid such money into court.—Dunn v. Champion, 99 S.W.2d 813, 266 Ky. 757.

him [6] The mere fact that the officer was the holder of a void process would be no protection to his surety if, acting under color of office, he disposed of property in a manner different from that directed by the law in cases of possessory warrants.[7]

§ 199. —— Jurisdiction and Venue

The jurisdiction and venue of actions on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are dependent on statute

Jurisdiction of actions on the official bond of a sheriff or constable belongs to such courts, and such only, as may have been given it by statute [8] A statutory provision that like proceedings shall be had in such actions as in other actions of a designated character has been held not to give exclusive jurisdiction thereof to the court having jurisdiction of such other actions, but merely to prescribe the form of the proceedings,[9] but there is also authority for the view that the court having jurisdiction of such other actions is, by such a provision, given jurisdiction of an action on an officer's bond.[10]

Venue. As is the rule generally, the venue of an action on the official bond or a sheriff or constable is dependent on statute [11] Under a statute providing that an action against a public officer, or an action on his official bond, shall be brought in the county where the cause or some part thereof arose, an action on the bond of a sheriff or constable for an official default must be brought in the county in which the default occurred.[12] Within this rule, the liability of sureties for an officer's failure to execute process issued from another county than that in which he officiates is properly brought in the latter county, rather than in the county from which the process issued.[13] An action founded on the failure of an officer to pay over money collected by him under process issued from another county has been held to be properly brought in the county of which he is officer, and not that from which the process issued,[14] and it has been held that an action based on the failure of an officer to return process to another county, from which it issued, should be brought in the county of which he is an officer, rather than that from which the process issued and to which it should have been returned,[15] but under some statutes the action may properly be brought in the county from which the process issued [16]

Under a statute so providing, the venue of a suit against the surety is in the county in which the surety bond is filed.[17] Where the statute permits nonlocal actions to be brought in the county in which either plaintiff or defendant resides, an action on a bond in the name of the state to the use or on the relation of one injured by the officer's default may be brought in the county in which the relator resides, although none of defendants resides therein.[18] Under a statute requiring actions to be brought in the county of defendant's domicile, except where it is founded on a trespass, in which case the action may be brought in the county where the trespass occurred, it has been held that an action against the sureties on an officer's bond, in which action the officer is not joined, may be brought only in the county of their domicile, and not in another county where the trespass occurred [19] Where the place is not otherwise fixed or restricted by statute, it has been held that such an action, not

a. Time to sue
b. Limitations

a. Time to Sue

Action may be commenced on the official bond of a sheriff or constable as soon as a cause of action accrues.

In accordance with general rules as to the accrual of a cause of action, as stated in Actions § 124, an action may be commenced on the official bond of a sheriff or constable as soon as a cause of action accrues.[21] Thus, where an officer has refused to levy an execution on property pointed out to him by plaintiff, an action on his bond therefor, although instituted before the return of the execution, is not premature,[22] and, similarly, an action on an officer's bond may be commenced at once after a judgment has been recovered against him for a wrongful levy, although the return day of the process has not arrived.[23]

b. Limitations

Action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable must be brought within the period prescribed by statute for such actions.

An action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable may be brought only within such time as may be prescribed by statute for such actions, and not after the expiration thereof.[24] Thus, where the statute limits the time within which an action on the bond may be brought to a specified period after the date of the bond, such action is barred on the expiration of such period, notwithstanding the officer's term of office is extended;[25] but it has been held that the statute does not bar an action for a default occurring after the expiration of such period, on the part of an officer whose term is greater than that specified by the statute, where the sureties on the bond have voluntarily bound themselves as sureties during the officer's continuance in such office.[26] Apart from any statutory limitation mere delay in bringing suit on an officer's bond will not bar an action,[27] provided no contract, consideration, or motive inducing the delay is shown,[28] unless sufficient time has elapsed to raise a presumption of performance of the condition of the bond.[29]

A statute prescribing the period within which action must be brought on a constable's bond has been held not to be a general statute of limitation, but rather a special statutory limitation,[30] which is in the nature of a condition put on the right of action and qualifying the right,[31] and which, therefore, may not be waived by the surety.[32] A statute limiting the time within which actions against sureties on bonds or recognizances of sheriffs may be brought has been held to be applicable only to official bonds given to the state,[33] and to be inapplicable to a bond given to a sheriff by his deputy.[34] A general statute of limitation of actions on officers' bonds is limited or superseded pro tanto by another statutory provision prescribing a shorter period of limitation as to particular actions.[35]

Stipulation discontinuing action without prejudice

Where relator brought assault action against constable and joined surety on constable's bond as defendant, and surety entered into stipulation with relator discontinuing action as to surety without prejudice to relator to proceed against constable and on his bond should relator secure verdict, stipulation did not effect any change in the legal relationship of the parties and the surety could defend subsequent action on bond on ground that suit was barred by statute requiring action on constable's bond to be instituted within five years of date of bond—Commonwealth ex rel. Hughes v. Maryland Cas Co., supra.

35. Kan—Ryus v. Gruble, 3 P. 518, 31 Kan. 767.

A statute limiting the time within which actions for particular classes of defaults or misconduct may be brought is not applicable to actions for other official wrongs.[36] A statute relating to the time of commencing actions on a sheriff's bond does not embrace an action on the bond of a constable,[37] and a statute prescribing the time within which motions must be made against an officer for a statutory penalty does not apply to an action on his bond.[38] Similarly, a statute limiting the time for bringing action against an officer personally for damages does not restrict the time within which an action may be brought against him and the sureties on his bond,[39] or against the sureties after judgment has been recovered against the officer,[40] but a statute limiting the time for commencing an action against a sheriff on a liability incurred by the doing of an act in his official capacity has been held to limit the time for action on his official bond, in the absence of any other provision as to the sureties.[41]

The application of general statutes of limitation and of general principles relating to the application of statutes of limitation is discussed in appropriate sections in Limitations of Actions. Thus, the question whether an action on an officer's bond is barred by the fact that an action against the officer is barred is discussed in Limitations of Actions § 10 b, and questions relating to the accrual of an action on the bond of a sheriff or constable, or such officer's deputy, with respect to the computation of the statutory period, are discussed in § 148 a (2) of that title.

Commencement of period. Under the provisions of various statutes to that effect, the period prescribed for the bringing of an action on the bond of a sheriff or constable begins to run from the date of the accrual of the cause of action,[42] or from the date of the act done or omitted by the officer which fixes the liability of the surety,[43] or from the date of the bond.[44] Where an omission or neglect of a sheriff or constable constitutes a continuing breach of his official bond, a period prescribed by a statute of limitations, after which action for such breach cannot be brought, commences to run only at the expiration of his term of office.[45] It has been held that, under a statute barring actions at a specified time after the expiration of the officer's term, the resignation of an officer before his term expires does not set the statutory period to running.[46]

Extension of period. A statute enlarging the period within which actions on the official bonds of constables may be commenced is not applicable to an action on a bond executed prior to the passage of such statute.[47]

Malfeasance held not within statute
Action by state against former sheriff and surety to recover money allegedly misappropriated from sheriff's salary fund was not barred by prescription of two years as to acts of misfeasance and nonfeasance, although all alleged irregularities occurred more than two years prior to filing of action, since wrongful acts, if any, constituted "malfeasance" as to which the two-year prescription was inapplicable—State ex rel Jones v. Doucet, 14 So.2d 622, 203 La. 743.

In Michigan
(1) Under statutes so providing, a ten-year period of limitation applies to actions on the bonds of public officers generally, while a two-year period applies to actions for the misconduct or neglect of sheriffs or their deputies and for certain specified acts—Hurst v Charron, 255 N W 419, 267 Mich 210—Lenawee County v. Nutten, 208 N W. 613, 234 Mich 391.

(2) The reason for the two-year period of limitation is that in all of those actions plaintiff will have notice of the wrong or injury done to him at the time it is committed, and it is deemed no hardship to require him to begin his action therefor within the short period of limitation—Lenawee County v. Nutten, supra.

(3) Ten-year limitation, not two-year limitation, was held applicable to action on sheriff's bond for failure to pay over fees collected by him—Lenawee County v. Nutten, supra.

(4) But two-year limitation was held applicable to action on bond for false imprisonment, which offense is specifically included in the two-year statute—Hurst v. Charron, 255 N W 419, 267 Mich 210.

a. Plaintiffs

Except where suit is in equity, or statutes otherwise provide, it is generally held that an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable naming a governmental body or officer as obligee must be brought in the name of such obligee for the use of the person injured by the default on which the action is founded.

In accordance with the rules governing parties to actions on official bonds generally, as discussed in Officers § 174, it is generally held that, except where the suit is in equity, or where statutes otherwise provide, an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable which names as obligee the state,[48] the people,[49] the municipality or county,[50] or a designated public officer[51] or court,[52] may be brought only in the name of the nominal obligee, for the use and benefit,[53] or on the relation,[54] of the person injured by the default on which the action is founded. However, in a jurisdiction in which a statutory provision granting the right to the injured person to sue on the official bond in his own name was omitted in the revision of the statute and subsequently restored, it was held that the injured person had the right to sue in his own name during the interim when the statute did not expressly so provide,[55] and another statute providing that suit may be brought in the name of the state for the benefit of all parties interested was held permissive only and not to change the rule[56]

Where the nominal obligee is also the person injured, he may maintain an action for his own use,[57] but, where not he, but another, has been injured by the default constituting the cause of action, he cannot, merely as obligee, maintain an action on the bond,[58] except where the statute authorizes the trustee of an express trust,[59] or one in whose name a contract is made for the benefit of another,[60] to maintain an action in his own name, in which case suit may be brought by the nominal obligee Where a bond names no obligee, but is conditioned for the payment of sums due to any person to whom the officer may become liable, or for the payment of money to the person entitled thereto, an action on the bond is properly brought in the name of the injured person[61] A suit in equity on an officer's bond must be brought in the name of the person injured by the breach of its conditions.[62]

Where, by statute, actions are authorized or required to be brought in the name of the real party in interest,[63] or actions on official bonds are authorized or required to be brought in the name of the party aggrieved by a default of the officer,[64] the person injured or damaged by a default of a sheriff or constable is, unless otherwise specifically provided by statute,[65] the proper party plaintiff in an action on the officer's bond, even though he is

Action by sheriff on bond of coroner acting as sheriff

Where a sheriff obtained judgment on a forthcoming bond and, being disqualified to make a levy of the same, turned over the fieri facias to the coroner, acting as sheriff, it was held that the sheriff, as the party aggrieved, even after he had gone out of office, could bring action on the official bond of the coroner for the coroner's neglect of duty in connection therewith, either in his own name or for the use of anyone he might designate as usee.—Harrell v. Emanuel, 109 S.E. 294, 27 Ga.App. 546

65. N.C.—Carmichael v. Moore, 88 N.C. 29

a stranger to the process with respect to which the default occurred.[66] The owner of a judgment, whether or not it was rendered in his favor, is the party entitled to sue for the failure of an officer to make the money on an execution issued thereon or to pay over the money collected.[67] Thus, an assignee of a judgment rendered against an officer for damages arising from his misconduct in office may maintain an action in his own name on the officer's official bond to recover the amount of the damages,[68] and an action cannot be maintained in the name of one who, before its commencement, assigned the judgment to another.[69] Where plaintiff leased property in his own name as landlord, the fact that he listed the property for taxation for certain years as trustee of another does not prevent him from maintaining a suit in his own name on an officer's bond to recover damages for misconduct causing the loss of his landlord's lien.[70]

Single action for full penalty. Where only a single action may be brought on the official bond of a sheriff or constable, for the full penalty thereof, it must be in the name of the nominal obligee;[71] and even a statutory provision that every action shall be brought in the name of the real party in interest will not enable one injured by the officer's default to maintain the action in his own name.[72]

Assignment by obligee to successor in office. Where the bond of a sheriff or constable runs to a named officer and his successors in office, an action may be brought thereon in the name of a subsequent incumbent of the office without any assignment of the bond,[73] provided it is good as a statutory bond,[74] but it has also been held that an action on such a bond may be brought in the name of the person who was the incumbent of the office at the time when the bond was executed and need not be brought in the name of his successor.[75]

Style of action by public officer as obligee. Where the obligee is a public officer, it has been held that, as plaintiff, he may be designated by his official title only, without the addition of his name,[76] although there is also authority to the contrary,[77] but he cannot properly be designated merely by his name without his official title,[78] or be made plaintiff in his personal rather than his official capacity,[79] since his right as obligee is in his official capacity.[80] A fortiori, a suit in the individual name of one who was incumbent of the office when the bond was given but has since gone out of office is unauthorized.[81] An action cannot be brought in the name of the personal representatives of a deceased officer, but must be brought in the name of his successor in office.[82]

Action on bond of deputy. An action on the official bond of a deputy sheriff or constable for a default of such deputy imposing liability on his principal is properly brought in the name of the principal officer individually, and not in his official capacity.[83] Under a statute providing for liability on the official bond of an officer for damages accruing from his unlawful or careless use of a pistol or revolver, an action on the bond of a deputy payable to his principal officer may be maintained in the name of such principal at the relation of the person injured.[84]

Joinder. Under the general rule that all persons having a material interest in the subject matter of a suit must be made parties thereto, as discussed in Parties § 1 f, it has been held that one entitled, under a contract with the owner of property, to a portion of the proceeds thereof is a proper party plaintiff to a suit on the bond of an officer wrongfully seizing such property while the contract remained executory,[85] but there is authority for the view that an action on an officer's bond for his failure to return property levied on when it became his duty to do so may be maintained by one joint owner of such property without making the other joint owner a party.[86] Under statutes providing that action on the official bond must be brought in the name of the real party in interest or the party aggrieved, the nominal obligee of the bond is not a necessary party plaintiff,[87] unless injured by the default, or in some manner entitled to something that may be recovered on the bond.[88]

b. Defendants

Ordinarily, an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable should be brought against the officer and his sureties as codefendants.

Ordinarily, an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable may and should properly be brought against the officer and his sureties as codefendants,[89] and it has been held that the surety cannot be sued without joinder of the officer if the latter has not been sued, is solvent, and is accessible to suit.[90] However, it has also been held that suit may be brought against the surety on the bond without joining the officer;[91] and where, after a default, an officer dies, an action may be brought against his sureties without joining his personal representatives.[92] Where the bond is in terms joint and several, or the statute requires that it be so construed or allows it to be so treated, an action thereon may be maintained against all the sureties jointly,[93] or against one or more of them severally,[94] without joining the officer,[95] or against the officer or his representatives alone,[96] or against the officer and any or all of the sureties.[97]

Where an action on an officer's bond to recover the proceeds of attached property sold by him is brought by one who was not a party to the attachment suit, but who claims to have been a joint owner of the property sold, defendant in the attachment suit is a necessary party.[98] In an action on a sheriff's official bond for the sheriff's improper conduct with respect to attached property, the surety on the bond given to the sheriff to indemnify him against claims of third-party claimants to the attached property is not a necessary or proper party.[99] In an action by an execution creditor, against an officer and the sureties on his bond to recover money alleged to have been collected by the officer on such execution, and converted by him to his own use, an attorney to whom defendants allege the money was paid by the creditor's direction is not a proper party defendant.[1]

Several bonds. Where there is doubt on which of two or more bonds a liability falls,[2] or as to the extent of the liability on each of several bonds,[3] the sureties on both or all of such bonds may and should be made parties defendant.

In action on officer's bond for deputy's default the deputy is not a necessary party defendant,[4] but he may properly be joined, if the case is one in which he is liable to plaintiff,[5] provided, where his liability is in tort, it is permissible to join a cause of action therefor with the contract action on the bond, as discussed in Actions § 93.

Bonds for successive terms

County's bill for an accounting against sheriff was not subject to objection of misjoinder of parties because two different sureties on two different bonds were joined with sheriff as defendant, notwithstanding sureties were not jointly liable for matters complained of but one surety was liable for any defalcation on part of sheriff during first four years of his incumbency and other surety was liable for any defalcation occurring during the succeeding years, since to avoid multiplicity of suits, it was entirely proper to join the parties in one action.—Cass County v. Shattuck, supra.

4. Tex.—Fox v. Cone, 13 S.W.2d 65, 118 Tex. 212.

5. Tex.—Fox v. Cone, supra.

Principal as party to suit on deputy's bond In an action on a deputy's bond by a third person for a default of such deputy for which he is liable to plaintiff, his principal is not a necessary party defendant;[6] but it has also been held that since the principal and the surety on his bond may be liable for the misconduct of the deputy, such principal and his surety are proper and necessary parties to an action against the deputy.[7]

Persons not parties to bond. Since an action against a sheriff or constable and the sureties on his official bond is ex contractu in nature, as discussed supra § 195, one who was not a party to the bond may not properly be joined as a party defendant,[8] and, if joined, should be stricken on proper and timely objection of misjoinder of parties.[9]

c. Intervention and New Parties

Rules governing intervention and bringing in of new parties in civil actions generally apply in actions on the official bond of a sheriff or constable.

Rules governing intervention and bringing in of new parties in civil actions generally, as discussed in Parties §§ 53-84, have been applied in actions on the official bond of a sheriff or constable.[10] Thus, it has been held that, in an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable against the sureties alone, it is an abuse of the court's discretion to refuse to permit the officer to become a party, on his application to intervene and the motion of the sureties,[11] and in an action by a mortgagee on an officer's bond for his misconduct in a sale under the mortgage, the holder of a note secured by the same mortgage may intervene, under a statute authorizing the intervention in actions of persons who have an interest in the matter in litigation.[12] In an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable, the court has power to bring in new parties whose presence is necessary to the determination of the case,[13] but new parties cannot be brought in where their joinder would introduce a new and different cause of action or defense.[14] An irregularity in an intervention in an action on a sheriff's official bond may be waived by the failure of defendants to raise a timely objection thereto.[15]

§ 202. —— Process and Appearance

Rules relating to process in civil actions generally apply in actions on the official bond of a sheriff or constable.

In accordance with rules relating to process and the issuance and service thereof in civil actions generally, it has been held that the omission or neglect to comply with a statute requiring the clerk, before issuance of the writ in an action on the official bond of a sheriff, to indorse thereon the name of the party at whose instance and for whose use the suit is instituted does not render the writ illegal, and such omission on any renewed writ does not work a discontinuance of the action.[16] Where, in an action against a sheriff and his surety, the verdict has been directed for the sheriff, it is immaterial that the surety was never served with summons, since the surety could only be liable in the event that liability was established against the sheriff.[17]

(2) Allegations as to particular matters

(1) In General

In order to state a cause of action in a suit on the official bond of a sheriff or constable, plaintiff's pleading must allege some right in him from which he has been restrained by the malicious act of the officer, or malfeasance or neglect by the officer in the execution of some process in which plaintiff was concerned.

Intervention by party suing on recognizance

Irregularity in intervention of plaintiff alleging cause of action on sheriff's recognizance, because of sheriff's unauthorized release of prisoner taken on writ of capias ad satisfaciendum, in action of assumpsit commenced originally on sheriff's bond, was held not to preclude recovery on recognizance, where question of right to maintain action was not raised in affidavit of defense.—Commonwealth to Use of Blystone v Davis, supra.

16. Md.—Logan v. State, 39 Md. 177.

17. Ark.—Bridwell v. Anderson, 156 S.W.2d 231, 203 Ark. 69.

In order to state a cause of action in a suit on the official bond of a sheriff or constable, the complaint, declaration, or petition must allege some right in plaintiff from the exercise of which he has been restrained by the malicious act of the officer,[18] or it must charge the officer with malfeasance or neglect in his ministerial capacity in the execution of some process in which plaintiff was concerned.[19] The pleading must allege facts, not mere conclusions,[20] but the fact that a declaration pleads matter of evidence does not make it fatally defective.[21] It is not vitiated by a failure to allege the cause of action clearly or in proper form, where it sets forth facts sufficient to support a judgment.[22]

A petition in an action against an officer and a surety on his official bond which alleges that the officer wrongfully attached plaintiff's property under a process against a third person alone, and that the covenants of the official bond, a copy of which is made part of the petition, were thereby broken has been held to show sufficiently that plaintiff intends to assert a cause of action on the officer's official bond for his official misconduct.[23] Where an execution is set out by way of inducement in an action on a bond, a substantial description thereof is sufficient.[24] Where a bond is joint and several, and action is brought thereon after the death of the officer, it is not necessary to notice his death in the declaration.[25] In an action in the name of the nominal obligee of a bond, where that is proper, it has been held unnecessary to aver for whose use the action is brought,[26] although the pleading may also name the use beneficiary.[27]

Conspiracy. Where the complaint alleges that the officer and others were engaged in a conspiracy with respect to plaintiff, facts must be alleged showing concerted action and disclosing the scheme or conspiracy.[28]

Prayer for relief. A declaration in an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable is not subject to demurrer because the damages prayed are larger than the penalty of the bond.[29] The fact that plaintiff asks judgment for a statutory penalty which cannot be recovered in an action, but only in summary proceedings, does not render the declaration bad on general demurrer.[30]

(2) Allegations as to Particular Matters
- (a) In general
- (b) Breach of condition of bond

(a) In General

As a general rule, in an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable, the complaint, declaration, or petition should show compliance with all conditions precedent to the right of recovery, the plaintiff's interest in the subject matter of the action, the provisions or conditions of the bond, the fact that the officer acted in his official capacity, and that the plaintiff has suffered some injury or damage as a result of the officer's default or misconduct.

In an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable the complaint, declaration, or petition should show compliance with all conditions precedent to the right of recovery;[31] but it has been held that a failure to show that leave of court to bring action has been obtained, where such leave is required, is waived by defendants unless prompt objection is made.[32] Plaintiff's pleading must also show his interest in the subject matter of the action,[33] although in an action for misfeasance preventing the collection of a judgment originally rendered in favor of another, plaintiff may allege his ownership of such judgment in general terms without stating how it was acquired.[34] Under a statute providing that pending removal proceedings of an officer another person may be appointed to the office for the time being and that such person shall execute a bond conditioned to pay the suspended officer all damages and costs that he may have sustained by reason of such suspension if it should appear that the cause or causes of removal are insufficient or untrue, a suspended constable, in an action on the bond executed by the person temporarily appointed constable, must allege that the causes of removal were insufficient or untrue.[35]

Validity and provisions of bond. Although there is some authority to the contrary,[36] it is generally held that the complaint, declaration, or petition in an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable should set out the provisions or condition,[37] and state the penalty,[38] of the bond, or, where required by statute or rule of court, attach a copy thereof;[39] and it should allege distinctly that it is the official bond of the officer as such,[40] or should allege in effect that the suit is on the bond as a common-law undertaking.[41] It must also be averred that the persons sued as sureties executed the bond,[42] and that they were such sureties at the time of the breach complained of;[43] but it need not be alleged that a foreign surety company was authorized to do business in the state,[44] the contrary fact being a matter of defense.[45] In a declaration on a bond given in pursuance of an order of a court or other agency, it is not necessary to set out such order;[46] and in an action on a bond given as additional security, under a statute providing therefor, plaintiff need not show how the necessity for such additional security arose, or state that it was given in pursuance of a requisition of the officers having a right to require it.[47] A profert of a certified copy of the bond has been held to be requisite.[48]

It has been held that, where the complaint alleges in express terms the execution of the bond, it comprehends every act essential to a complete making and delivery of the bond,[49] and that it need not allege that conditions precedent to the bond becoming a valid obligation were performed,[50] or expressly allege the approval and filing of the bond.[51] Where express approval is not requisite it need not be averred,[52] and it is not necessary that any disapproval be expressly negatived by the complaint,[53] but, where approval of the bond is necessary to its effectiveness or sufficiency, the complaint must show an approval thereof by the proper officer or authority,[54] or state facts showing a waiver of the approval,[55] or facts which estop the sureties from urging its nonapproval.[56]

Nonpayment of penalty. In a declaration on the official bond of a sheriff or constable it has been held not to be necessary to allege the nonpayment of the penalty of the bond by the obligors, but to be sufficient for the assignment of the breach to allege the nonpayment of the sum due from the officer whose duty it was to pay it;[57] but there is authority to the contrary that the omission of an averment of the failure of defendants to pay the penalty of the bond is fatal.[58] Where the bond is joint and several and the action is brought after the death of the officer, it is not necessary to allege nonpayment of the penalty by the officer's representatives.[59]

Official capacity of officer. A complaint, declaration, or petition, in an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable, must allege facts which establish that the action is against the officer in his official capacity.[60] However, the complaint need not allege that the sheriff had performed the acts necessary to qualify for sheriff,[61] it being sufficient that it alleged that defendant was the sheriff;[62] and a pleading which states facts sufficient to show that the officer is such de facto is not insufficient because it fails to show that he is such officer de jure.[63]

Official character of act or default. In order to charge the sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable, in an action thereon, facts must be averred in the complaint, declaration, or petition which show that the act or default complained of was committed by the officer in his official capacity.[64] Where facts are set forth which contradict an allegation that the officer acted in his official capacity, the complaint is demurrable.[65] An allegation that the injuries complained of were inflicted on a day subsequent to the execution of the process is not fatally inconsistent with an allegation that such injuries occurred in the execution thereof, where it is shown that the process was only partially executed on the first day.[66]

Default of deputy. In an action on an officer's bond for default of a deputy the complaint need not allege in terms that the officer is liable for the wrongful act or omission of the deputy on which the action is founded, since his liability is a question of law,[67] but the complaint must allege facts showing that the alleged deputy was in fact such,[68] and was acting under color of office or in performance of an official duty,[69] and was guilty of some default or misconduct therein.[70]

Damage. In an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable, the complaint, declaration, or petition must show that plaintiff has suffered some injury or damage as a result of the default or misconduct complained of,[71] the manner of such damage,[72] that it was fairly and legally consequent on such default or misconduct,[73] the amount thereof,[74] and that such damage has not yet been paid.[75] However, where the act or misconduct on which the action is founded constitutes a criminal offense, it is not necessary to allege any pecuniary loss or actual injury.[76] In an action for a wrongful seizure an averment that the goods seized and still held by the officer belong to plaintiff and are of a specified value lays a sufficient foundation for a measure of damages.[77]

(b) Breach of Condition of Bond

Plaintiff's pleading must allege facts showing a breach of the condition of the bond, and it must show that the default on which the action is based occurred within the period covered by the bond.

Recovery may be had in an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable for such breaches only as are set out and relied on in the declaration, petition, or complaint,[78] which must accordingly allege with certainty and precision facts showing a breach of the condition of the bond.[79] A particular breach must be alleged,[80] and it is not sufficient to allege in general terms that the officer did not properly perform his duties,[81] or to aver a breach which is in the alternative.[82] Where the allegations concerning the default or misconduct on which the breach is predicated are such as would be sufficient as to the officer himself, they are sufficient as to his sureties,[83] but it has been held that, where a petition sets out a cause of action in tort against the sheriff, it does not establish a cause of action against the sureties on the bond for the reason that their liability is based on contract.[84] Assignments of breaches of an officer's bond are to be construed strictly against the pleader.[85]

The complaint, petition, or declaration should show that the default on which the action is founded occurred after the execution of the bond,[86] and it must ordinarily be alleged that the default occurred during the officer's term, for which the sureties were bound,[87] or, if it occurred after the expiration of the officer's term, the complaint must show, as against the sureties, that a successor had not been elected and qualified.[88]

It has been held that, where the declaration contains several assignments of breaches, some of which are sufficiently averred and others not, the judgment on demurrer must be for plaintiff.[89] Where the breach alleged is not within the reasonable meaning of the condition of the bond, the declaration is demurrable,[90] and a judgment rendered on a declaration in which any breaches are alleged which are not within the condition of the bond is bad.[91] Similarly, a complaint claiming more than the amount of the penalty named in the bond is demurrable as to the excess.[92] Where the causes of action which may be joined are classified by the statute, it has been held that the assignment in one count of two or more breaches of an officer's bond does not render the declaration demurrable under a statute making the improper uniting of causes of action a cause for demurrer on the ground that such provision refers only to the union of actions of different classes.[93]

Charging excessive fees. A complaint, declaration, or petition on the official bond of a sheriff or constable assigning as a breach that the officer unlawfully demanded and received a specified sum beyond his legal fees, for certain services specified, is good on general demurrer.[94]

Failure to execute process. In an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable for his failure to levy an execution, plaintiff must allege in his complaint, declaration, or petition that defendant in the execution had property which could have been found by the officer,[95] and on which the levy might have been made,[96] and that such property was of some value,[97] and, where the statute makes it the duty of an officer to levy unless otherwise directed by plaintiff, it has been held necessary to allege that the officer was not directed by plaintiff or his agent not to make a levy.[98] Similarly, in an action for failure to execute a capias ad satisfaciendum, the declaration must aver that, while the officer held the execution, defendants therein, or some of them, were within his bailiwick, and might have been arrested.[99]

In an action for failure to make the money on an execution, a complaint alleging that property was levied on by the officer and advertised for sale as property of the execution debtor is sufficient, without alleging that it was his property.[1] Where the action is for failure to levy an attachment, the petition must allege that plaintiff prosecuted his attachment suit to final judgment,[2] since otherwise no injury to plaintiff is shown.[3] It has been held that a petition in an action based on the officer's neglect of duty in carrying into effect an execution issued by a justice of the peace should specifically state the facts necessary to give jurisdiction to the justice.[4] In debt against an officer on his official bond for not making the money on an execution, it is not a sufficient breach to allege merely that he did not sell property taken on execution, but it should also be alleged that he did not have the money before the court at the return day.[5] Where the action is for failure to execute a writ of replevin, the tender of a sufficient bond must be averred.[6]

Wrongful seizure. A complaint, in an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable, alleging that the officer wrongfully took and carried away designated property belonging to plaintiff,[7] or that he levied execution issued on a judgment which he knew had become dormant, so that no execution could rightfully issue or sale be had thereon,[8] sufficiently states a cause of action for a wrongful seizure. The failure of the complaint to describe the property seized is not fatal, as amounting to a failure to state a cause of action,[9] and the defect may be reached only by the remedy for indefiniteness and uncertainty.[10] Where the action is based on a seizure of exempt property, the declaration must state facts showing the right to the exemption,[11] but where, under the statute, property up to a prescribed value may be claimed as exempt in lieu of that specifically exempted by statute, it has been held that plaintiff need not allege that he did not possess property of the character specifically exempted,[12] or that his entire property, including that levied on, did not exceed in value the statutory amount.[13] The pleading must sufficiently allege that plaintiff is entitled to possession of the seized property.[14]

Loss of property. A complaint in an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable by a plaintiff in replevin for the loss of the property is defective where it does not state that the replevin action had been prosecuted to final judgment.[15] Where the action is for failure safely to keep attached property to satisfy the execution in the attachment

Pleading held sufficient

(1) Complaint alleging sheriff's unlawful seizure and holding of possession of plaintiff's dwelling against plaintiff has been held a sufficient allegation of plaintiff's right to possession and ownership.—Gray v. Sanderson, supra.

(2) An allegation in a petition that the officer seized certain property while in plaintiff's possession and by force removed it from his possession and refused to deliver it to him is a sufficient averment of plaintiff's possession and the officer's interference therewith.—Richardson v. Samuelson, 26 P. 12, 45 Kan. 589

(3) A petition alleging that plaintiff was in possession of certain property by virtue of a chattel mortgage and that by reason of the officer's seizing and holding the property a right of action accrued to plaintiff has been held sufficient after judgment as to the ownership of plaintiff.—Richardson v. Samuelson, supra.

suit, an allegation that plaintiff lost his debt by reason of such neglect is not essential.[16] In an action for negligence in suffering attached property to be wasted, a petition which alleges that the property has been attached as the property of the debtor, and that the attachment lien had been foreclosed, and an order for the sale of the property issued, is sufficient, although it does not aver that the attached property actually belonged to the debtor or was subject to attachment.[17]

Failure or refusal to deliver property A complaint in an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable for the officer's failure to deliver property must show plaintiff's right to have it delivered to him.[18] A complaint alleging as a breach of the bond that the officer refused to deliver possession of property taken in an action of detinue on a defendant in such action tendering him a bond need not set out either the writ of detinue[19] or the bond tendered;[20] and it is not demurrable because it shows on its face that the property was in the custody of the law.[21]

Wrongful sale. In an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable for wrongfully selling property which it was the duty of the officer to reserve from sale, an allegation that the owner requested him to reserve it is mere surplusage [22] Where the action is for selling mortgaged property, an allegation in the complaint that the officer levied on and sold the property sufficiently charges that he levied on and sold all of it [23] In an action for selling plaintiff's property under process against another person who was in possession thereof, it is not necessary to allege specifically that the property was not subject to sale on execution against the holder, but an averment of title in plaintiff is sufficient.[24] A complaint alleging that plaintiff demanded his personal property exemptions in time, but that the officer failed and refused to allot such exemptions to him, and afterward sold the property and applied the money to executions in his hands, sufficiently alleges a breach of the bond [25]

Failure to sell; sale at inadequate price. A declaration in an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable which alleges that the officer neglected to sell property levied on under execution issued under a judgment, whereby plaintiff lost his debt, states a cause of action for such failure to sell,[26] except that, where the property was such as might have been relieved by giving a forthcoming bond, it should be alleged that no such bond was given [27] It is not essential to the statement of a cause of action that plaintiff allege anything more as to the execution debtor's interest in the property than that the officer had levied on and seized all his right, title, and interest therein,[28] and it is not necessary that the value of such interest be stated,[29] but a petition which fails to set forth the value of the property levied on or to aver that it would have been sufficient, if sold, to satisfy plaintiff's claim is insufficient to authorize the entry of a judgment by default for the amount of such claim.[30] A specific allegation that the failure or refusal to sell was wrongful is not necessary.[31]

In an action on a sheriff's or constable's official bond for damages caused by the illegal and fraudulent conduct of the officer in selling property of plaintiff on execution, by reason of which the property was sold for much less than its value, it is not necessary to specify the illegal and fraudulent acts.[32]

Failure to convey property sold. In an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable for failure to convey to the purchaser property alleged to have been sold by the officer under execution, the declaration should state that the execution was levied on the property,[33] and that the property belonged to

Loss of property during interpleader proceedings

In action for damages against former sheriff and surety on his bond, complaint alleging that sheriff levied on property under execution, that third party claims were filed, that sheriff instituted interpleader proceedings which were determined in favor of the execution plaintiff, and that a goodly portion of property had slipped from sheriff's control but not because he considered himself not further bound to keep property for failure of execution plaintiff to give an indemnity bond, was sufficient as against general demurrer —Aker v Coleman, 88 P 2d 869, 60 Idaho 118.

defendant in the execution;[34] and it should describe such property with certainty.[35]

Failure to collect. In declaring on the official bond of a sheriff or constable for his failure to collect an account for fee bills, it must be alleged that the fees were due and owing to the relator.[36] An averment that, if the officer did not collect the money on a fee bill placed in his hands, it was his own neglect and fault is not sufficient to make him liable under a statute declaring him responsible for any injury resulting from a failure to collect such a bill when by proper diligence it might have been collected.[37] In an action of debt against an officer and his sureties for his failure to collect and pay over militia fines, the declaration must set forth the names of the persons against whom the fines were assessed, and the several amounts of the fines, as stated in the certificate of the president of the court-martial.[38]

Failure to pay over money. Where an action is brought on the official bond of a sheriff or constable for failure to pay over money, the collection or receipt thereof by the officer must be positively averred in the complaint, declaration, or petition,[39] and there must also be alleged the right of plaintiff to receive the money,[40] the officer's duty to pay it over,[41] and his failure to make such payment.[42] In an action for failure to pay over various moneys, however, a general averment of the receipt of the aggregate amount and failure to pay it over is sufficient without specifying each particular item received or each item of defalcation.[43] The fact that the sum alleged to have been collected or received by the officer is greater than that which was due on the execution in his hands does not vitiate a declaration.[44] Where a demand is necessary to render the officer liable for failing to pay over money or to constitute such failure a breach of his bond, a demand and refusal must be alleged,[45] although it has been held not necessary to set out the particular time at which and manner in which the demand was made;[46] but, where a demand is not necessary, a failure to allege its making is immaterial.[47]

An express averment that the process under which the officer collected the money was directed to him is not essential if that fact can be implied from the other facts alleged.[48] In an action for failure to pay over money collected on a county levy it is not necessary to allege that the levy was made by a majority of the justices of the county, or that they had all been summoned to attend the court.[49] It has been held that a declaration for failure to pay over money collected under execution is not fatally defective when it does not allege any judgment to warrant the execution.[50] Where a sheriff, acting as tax collector, has rendered an account of the taxes collected by him in a settlement with the county treasurer, which account is not itemized, it is not necessary, in an action on his bond for failure to pay over part of the money, for the complaint to specify any errors in such settlement.[51]

Taking insufficient bond. A pleading in an action for breach of the sheriff's bond by reason of his redelivery of attached property without taking a sufficient statutory forthcoming bond or replevin bond must state all the facts essential to such a cause of action.[52] Thus, a declaration or petition which does not allege negligence on the part of the officer in taking or approving an insufficient bond is fatally defective.[53] A declaration alleging that the officer did not well and faithfully perform his official duty in the premises, and under this allegation making the necessary specifications, sufficiently alleges a breach of the bond,[54] and it is not necessary to set forth the suit on the replevin bond and the failure of plaintiff to obtain satisfaction thereby.[55] It is not necessary in such an action to allege the residence of either the principal or the sureties on the replevin bond,[56] or to aver, for the purpose of showing its insufficiency, that the obligors had no property outside of the state,[57] but it is sufficient to state that they had no property within the state.[58]

Failure to return process. The complaint in an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable for his failure to return an execution should set out the judgment on which the execution issued;[59] and, where the execution was issued by a justice of the peace, it has been held necessary to state facts showing that the justice had jurisdiction.[60] An allegation in merely general terms that the officer did not make legal service and return of an execution placed in his hands is insufficient as an averment of failure to return the writ,[61] but a charge that the officer did not return an execution within the time limited by law is a good assignment of a breach of the bond.[62] Where the action is under a statute making the sheriff and his sureties liable for the amount of an execution and damages if the sheriff neglects, "without reasonable excuse," to return the execution within a certain time, it has been held that the petition must allege that the delay to make the return was without reasonable excuse.[63]

False return. In an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable for a false return, the pleading must allege all facts essential to such a cause of action.[64] Thus, it is not sufficient for plaintiff to allege merely that a false return was made,[65] but the declaration should state the nature of the return made,[66] and allege facts which if true show that the return is false.[67] In an action for making a false return of nulla bona on an execution in favor of plaintiff, it is not necessary to allege that the judgment is unsatisfied.[68]

Illegal or insufficient return. In an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable based on the illegality and insufficiency of the officer's return to an execution, the declaration should show what the return actually made was [69]

Wrongful arrest or imprisonment. It is sufficient to allege, in the complaint in an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable for a wrongful arrest, that the arrest was made wholly without warrant of law, and maliciously and wantonly,[70] or, it has been held, merely that the officer wrongfully arrested plaintiff,[71] or to set forth facts which show that the arrest was wrongful, although it is not in terms alleged to be such [72] Where the complaint shows that the arrest was made under a warrant, it must be alleged that the warrant was irregular on its face.[73] A complaint which fails to allege that the arrest was made without warrant, or that it was unlawful, is insufficient, even though it negatives the conditions on which a lawful arrest could have been made without a warrant.[74] In an action based on the officer's misconduct in the manner of making the arrest or in the treatment of the prisoner, plaintiff's pleading must allege the facts constituting the misconduct,[75] but it has been held not essential that the complaint allege fraud, deceit, or oppression.[76]

Escape. A declaration in an action against a sheriff or constable for an escape of plaintiff's debtor must show that plaintiff had recovered a judgment.[77] In an action for an alleged escape of a debtor in custody under bail process an allegation in the declaration that the capias was "marked and indorsed for bail" is sufficient to show that the officer was required by the process in his hands to hold defendant therein to bail.[78] In an action for injuries allegedly resulting from the negligence of a sheriff in permitting a prisoner to escape, the complaint must allege facts showing the requisite negligence.[79]

b. Plea, Answer, or Affidavit of Defense

(1) In general
(2) Pleading specially; pleas as to particular matters

(1) In General

A plea which is not responsive to the breaches assigned in the declaration or to the allegations thereof, or which sets up facts which, even if true, would not relieve the officer or his sureties of liability is bad on demurrer.

A plea which is not responsive to the breaches assigned in the declaration or to the allegations thereof,[80] or which sets up facts which, even if true, would not relieve the officer or his sureties of liability,[81] is bad on demurrer, as is also an answer which is indefinite or uncertain.[82] However, a plea denying a material and traversable allegation of the complaint is not demurrable;[83] and a plea setting up facts which, if true, relieve the defendants from liability is sufficient.[84] A general denial of all the material allegations of a complaint is qualified and superseded by an affirmative averment in the answer which in legal effect admits the cause of action.[85]

A plea of nil debet[86] or non damnificatus[87] has been held not proper in an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable, although as to the latter plea there is also authority to the contrary;[88] and, where the breach assigned is a failure to return an execution issued from a court not of record, a plea that there is no record of such judgment and execution is bad.[89] A plea of performance of covenants has been considered proper,[90] although as to this there is also authority to the contrary.[91] The penal sum named in the bond need not be pleaded by the sureties in order to prevent a judgment from being rendered against them for any greater sum.[92]

Affidavit of defense. Statutes and rules of court requiring the filing of an affidavit of defense to prevent summary judgment from being taken in actions on obligations or recognizances have been held not to apply to actions on the official bond of a sheriff or constable,[93] at least where there is no allegation in plaintiff's pleading on which damages could be liquidated,[94] as where the action is founded on a tort on the part of the officer;[95] but such requirement has been held to be applicable where the action is founded on a failure to pay over money[96] or a failure to levy on and sell property under an execution.[97] Where no such affidavit is required, resulting in prisoner's death, in that sheriff took deceased into custody knowing he was ill and placed him at work on public roads, was held insufficient in not sufficiently charging that prevention of deceased's wife from giving him food and medicine while in jail caused death and in not charging he did not have medical attention and wholesome food.—State ex rel Trigg v. the filing of one, whether or not it is good, is immaterial.[98]

Cross complaint. A pleading filed by a sheriff or constable and the sureties on his official bond, in an action brought against them thereon, which shows an intention to bring into the cause as defendants the sureties on a bond of indemnity given to the officer, but in which no allegation of fact is made on which judgment might be rendered against such indemnitors, and no relief is prayed against them, is insufficient to support a judgment over against the indemnitors.[99]

(2) Pleading Specially; Pleas as to Particular Matters

In an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable, matters of affirmative defense and matters in confession and avoidance must be specially pleaded.

While defendant in an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable may, if he so desires, plead matter specially, even though it could be proved under the general issue,[1] matters of affirmative defense must be specially pleaded.[2] Accordingly, matter in avoidance of the right of action must be specially pleaded,[3] and a plea in confession and avoidance should allege facts sufficient to afford a complete justification.[4] Where the statute of limitations is regarded as an absolute limitation on suit and is a statute of repose, it may be invoked either by demurrer or by an affidavit of defense raising questions of law,[5] and need not be raised by an affirmative plea in the affidavit of defense.[6] A plea of non est factum,[7] and not nul tiel record,[8] is the proper plea, in an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable, to put in issue the execution of the bond. An allegation which denies the validity of the bond sued on but does not allege facts sufficient to show the correctness of such conclusion is demurrable.[9] Where the defense of a sheriff or constable to an action on his official bond for moneys alleged or found to be due from him is a refusal of credits to which he claims he is entitled, he must set out such credits specifically in his answer.[10]

In an action for the officer's failure to execute final process, a plea denying in the very language of the declaration the existence of such a judgment as the one on which it is alleged the execution issued may be sufficient, although it is not in the technical form of a plea of nul tiel record, and does not conclude with a prayer for judgment.[11] In an action for failure to levy and return an execution, a plea that the execution was not issued in conformity with the judgment, without showing in what respect it differs from the judgment, is bad on demurrer.[12] It has been held, on an action for the officer's failure to make the money on an execution, that a plea that the debt was paid to plaintiff is bad where it does not allege that the payment was made after the breach of duty by the officer.[13] Where a statute providing for the appointment of a county treasurer is not mandatory, a sheriff who is sued on his bond for county revenue collected must, if a treasurer has been appointed, and the revenue paid to him, plead these facts.[14]

c. Replication or Reply and Subsequent Pleadings

In an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable, a replication or reply should traverse the allegations of defendants' plea which are intended to be denied. Where the replication shows a breach of the condition of the bond, a rejoinder which does not legally avoid or deny such breach is bad on demurrer.

A replication or reply, in an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable, should traverse the Absence of injury

Where judgment creditor made out prima facie case under statute imposing liability on sheriff and his sureties for failure or refusal to levy on or sell property under execution, sheriff has burden to plead that his conduct did not result in injury to judgment creditor.—Blanscet v. Amount recoverable by diligent levy
If a sheriff is liable on his official bond for failure to levy on a judgment debtor's property, sheriff has burden of pleading that less than full amount of debt, interest, and costs could have been recovered by diligence in executing writ, in order to escape liability for entire amount.—Fant Mill Co. v. allegations of defendants' plea which are intended to be denied;[15] and a replication is bad where it does not meet defendants' averments of matter of affirmative defense,[16] or where it is argumentative and indefinite,[17] or where, even though the allegations of the replication are true, a bar to plaintiff's action is shown by defendants' plea.[18] Where defendants have pleaded performance, the replication should allege a breach,[19] but it should not contain, as one ground of reply, an averment of two or more breaches.[20]

Rejoinder. Where the replication shows a breach of the condition of the bond, a rejoinder which does not legally avoid or deny such breach is bad on demurrer;[21] but nevertheless plaintiff may put the facts in issue by surrejoinder instead of demurring.[22] A defendant who has pleaded that plaintiff was not damnified by the breach cannot by rejoinder set up matter in confession and avoidance.[23]

The proper method of disputing the legal sufficiency of pleadings in actions on the official bond of a sheriff or constable is by demurrer.

As in civil actions generally, the proper method of disputing the legal sufficiency of the pleadings in an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable is by demurrer.[24] Thus, the proper method of disputing the legal sufficiency of defendants' plea is by demurrer thereto, and not by replication.[25] Similarly, defects in a replication must be taken advantage of by demurrer.[26] Both a demurrer and a traverse cannot be interposed to the same portion of a pleading.[27] The propriety of the prosecution of such an action by a district attorney, as attorney for a municipality damaged by the breach on which the action is founded, cannot be raised by demurrer.[28]

e. Amendment of Pleadings

The rules respecting the amendment of pleadings in civil actions generally apply in actions on the official bond of a sheriff or constable

The rules respecting the amendment of pleadings in civil actions generally are applicable in an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable.[29] A petition which shows no right to maintain the action cannot be made effective by amendment.[30]

f. Issues, Proof, and Variance

In an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable all material allegations of the declaration or complaint, or of a special or affirmative defense, must be proved. The proof must be within the issues made by the pleadings, and a material variance between pleading and proof is fatal.

In accordance with the rules applicable in civil actions generally, in an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable all material allegations of the declaration or complaint,[31] or of a special or affirmative defense,[32] must be proved, even though they are matters of inducement;[33] but a failure to prove allegations which are merely cumulative and not an essential part of the matters set out is not fatal.[34] In an action by an officer on his deputy's bond for a false return for which a judgment has been rendered against the officer, the proper issue is one in which is involved only the falsity of that part of the return on which the judgment in the former action against the officer was based, and it is proper to exclude an issue involving the falsity of the return generally.[35] Where the declaration in an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable for a false return on a replevin writ avers that the property belonged to plaintiff, a plea that the officer did not make a false return does not put the right of property in issue.[36]

pleadings,[37] and must conform to the pleadings of the party by whom it is adduced,[38] and tend to support their allegations.[39] Proof for which no basis has been laid in the pleadings cannot be received;[40] and, where the petition or complaint fails to make out a case against the sureties, the defect cannot be supplied by proof.[41] A variance between pleading and proof which is slight and not of a character to mislead the adverse party to his prejudice is immaterial;[42] but a variance by which the adverse party might be prejudiced is fatal.[43]

§ 204. —— Evidence

a. Presumptions
b. Burden of proof
c. Admissibility
d. Weight and sufficiency

a. Presumptions

In actions on the official bond of a sheriff or constable various presumptions have been indulged, including the presumptions that a public officer has properly performed his duty, and that plaintiff has been damaged by the officer's failure to execute or to return process.

The usual presumption that a public officer has properly performed his duty, as discussed in Evidence § 146, obtains in an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable,[44] except where contradicted or overcome by evidence.[45] Thus, where the same person holds two offices of the same nature in different territorial jurisdictions, it will be presumed that in an act done by him in one of such jurisdictions he was acting as officer thereof rather than as officer of the other.[46] The acceptance of the officer's bond by the officer or tribunal to which it is required to be given is presumed when the bond is found on file with nothing to show that it has been rejected, and the officer has entered on the duties of his office;[47] and, where the bond is duly approved, its delivery is implied.[48] In an action for the money which the officer was ordered to pay plaintiff, it will be presumed that the officer received such money before the order was made.[49]

Where an officer has levied on property under a writ, and in his return did not specify its value, it will be presumed that it was of sufficient value to satisfy plaintiff's claim.[50] Where the officer and his sureties claim that an execution debtor had no property which could be levied on, and the latter testifies that he had no such property, his admission on cross-examination that he owned a particular article which might be exempt raises the presumption, in the absence of contrary proof, that it was exempt.[51] It has been held that, where a writ or claim is placed in the hands of a sheriff or constable, it will be presumed, in an action on his bond, to have been delivered to him in his official capacity, unless the contrary appear, even though a receipt given by him therefor is signed with his individual name without the addition of his title or office.[52] The failure of a plaintiff in a capias ad satisfaciendum to call on the officer at the return of the writ to produce the body of defendant in court does not furnish ground for a presumption, in an action on the officer's bond for an escape, that defendant was discharged from custody by plaintiff's consent.[53]

Time of default. In an action for a shortage in the accounts of an officer who has held two or more successive terms of office, it will be presumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the default occurred during the last term held by him,[54] but such presumption may be rebutted.[55] Where the complaint shows that the default on which the action is founded occurred after the expiration of the term for which the officer was elected or appointed, it will be presumed that he had gone out of office, in the absence of any allegation

negativing the election or qualification of a successor in office.[56]

Damage or loss. Where the action is based on the officer's failure to execute[57] or return[58] final process, it will be presumed that plaintiff was damaged in an amount equal to that for the collection of which the process was issued;[59] but there is no presumption of damage resulting from a failure to execute mesne process.[60] Plaintiff prima facie suffers a loss where the officer fails to take a proper bond on releasing property on which he has levied and the property disappears.[61]

b. Burden of Proof

In general, the burden is on plaintiff to prove all matters essential to his right to recover which are not admitted by defendants, and the burden is on defendants to establish facts relied on as justifying or obviating the effect of the act or omission on which the action is based

It is incumbent on plaintiff, in an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable, to establish by proof all matters which are essential to his right to recover and are not admitted by defendants.[62] Accordingly, plaintiff must prove, unless admitted by defendants,[63] the execution of the bond,[64] its delivery[65] and acceptance,[66] and that there has been a breach of its conditions.[67] Where approval of the bond is necessary to its validity and completeness, plaintiff must prove such approval.[68] Where it appears that the officer was appointed by an agency having authority to make such appointment only under particular circumstances, it is incumbent on plaintiff to show that such circumstances existed;[69] but it has been held that plaintiff is not obliged to prove that the officer was commissioned, where that has not been denied by defendants.[70] Plaintiff must also prove that in the matter complained of the officer was acting in his official capacity,[71] and it rests on plaintiff to overcome by proof the presumption that the officer has done his duty.[72]

In an action based on default with respect to an execution, plaintiff must prove the existence of the judgment,[73] and execution thereon,[74] and a delivery of the execution to the officer.[75] In an action for failure to pay over money, plaintiff must prove the collection of the money by the officer,[76] a demand on him therefor by plaintiff,[77] and a failure by the officer to pay over the money,[78] or such a misapplication of the money received or such misconduct on the part of the officer as establishes unfaithfulness in accounting with plaintiff and paying over to him what he was entitled to receive.[79] In an action for failure to collect claims put into the officer's hands for collection, it is not necessary for plaintiff to show in the first instance the validity of the claims.[80] In an action based on the misconduct of a deputy, plaintiff must prove that the misconduct of the deputy occurred while the deputy was engaged in the performance of an official duty as such officer,[81] and not while he was acting as a private individual,[82] or in some other capacity.[83]

Matter of defense. Where defendants seek to justify or obviate the effect of the act or omission on which the action is based, the burden is on them to establish the facts on which they rely.[84] Similarly, where the sureties rely on the defense that the default complained of is not covered by the bond, they assume the burden of proof,[85] and, where defendants deny that the bond is binding on them, by reason of some illegality, the burden of proof is on them.[86] Where, however, in an action for failure to levy on certain property, defendants have denied that the execution debtor owned the property and also alleged ownership of other persons as to particular articles, the latter allegations need not be proved[87] It has been held that in an action on a sheriff's bond for failure to pay over taxes, the sheriff is chargeable with the amount of the tax list, and has the burden of showing a discharge of any part thereof.[88]

Damage. The burden is on plaintiff to show that he has been damaged by reason of the matters complained of,[89] unless the default is such that the law presumes damage, as discussed supra subdivision a of this section, in which case the burden is on defendants to show that plaintiff was not damaged,[90] or that the extent of the injury is less than that which the law presumes,[91] but, where defendant has introduced evidence to rebut the inference of damage, plaintiff has the burden of showing damage[92] Where there is evidence to show damage, the burden is on defendants to show that the damage is less than that shown[93]

Leave to sue. It has been held that, even where leave of court to sue is necessary, it is not essential to a recovery that plaintiff give any proof of such leave obtained.[94]

c. Admissibility

In accordance with, and subject to, the rules of evidence in civil actions generally, in an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable, any evidence which bears on the right of recovery, and properly tends to establish or refute the contentions of the parties, or to furnish a means of estimating damage suffered, is admissible.

Value of property

In action against sheriff, defective forthcoming bond taken by sheriff in attachment suit, in absence of proof to contrary, was sufficient on which to fix valuation of property in excess of amount of debt and costs, and cast on sheriff burden of showing property was of less value.—Campbell v. Fidelity & Deposit Co. of Md., C.A.Mo., 179 F.2d 327.

(2) Evidence that the sheriff acted under the advice of counsel in arresting plaintiff and placing him in jail on Sunday, pursuant to warrant of arrest issued on such day, was held admissible.—Robinson v. Lovell, Tex.Civ.App., 238 S.W.2d 294, error refused no reversible error

Action for misconduct of deputy

(1) In action against sheriff and surety for deputy's misconduct in office, evidence that binding over by justice of peace for trial was secured by deputy's perjury was held competent.—Biehn v. Bannick, 7 P.2d 567, 166 Wash. 465.

(2) In suit for assault and unlawful imprisonment, officer, although mating correctly the injury which plaintiff has suffered because of the default or misconduct complained of and the amount of damages which should be awarded to him if he succeeds.[96] Evidence which is incompetent,[97] irrelevant,[98] or immaterial,[99] or tends only to arouse the sympathies of the jury,[1] or is for any other reason objectionable under the general rules of evidence,[2] should be excluded

d. Weight and Sufficiency

The general rules by which the weight and sufficiency of evidence are determined in civil actions are applicable in actions on the official bond of a sheriff or constable.

The general rules by which the weight and sufficiency of evidence are determined in civil actions are applicable in actions on the official bond of a sheriff or constable.[3] The rules have been applied in determining the sufficiency of the evidence with respect to the existence[4] and execution[5] of the bond, the official character of the act complained of,[6] the service of summons in a particular action,[7] the existence of a judgment to support certain process,[8] the issuance of a valid execution,[9] the exemption of an execution debtor from arrest,[10] the amount of a debt or its being due,[11] the validity of claims placed in an officer's hands for collection,[12] the levy or refusal to levy execution,[13] the availability or want of property on which to levy,[14]

Care of ponderous property
(1) Evidence, in action on sheriff's bond for nonforthcoming of crane after levy, concerning care customarily exercised by sheriffs of the county over ponderous property under levy, should not have been received, since to take the conduct of others as furnishing a sufficient legal standard of negligence would be to abandon standard set up by the substantive law—State, to Use of Henderson v Clark, 20 A 2d 127, 2 Terry, Del, 246, 138 A L R 704

(2) Testimony with respect to custom of having ponderous property guarded only if attorney for plaintiff in the writ so directed after being notified should not have been considered where there was no proof that attorney for plaintiff in the writ was notified—State, to Use of Henderson, v. Evidence held sufficient
(1) To sustain finding that wife of attachment defendant had title to property—Jolley v. Begeman, 256 N. W. 912, 65 N D. 205

(2) To support implied finding that sheriff could have found property subject to execution by exercise of due diligence, and that his failure to find property constituted dereliction

the insolvency of an execution debtor or other party,[15] the receipt of money by the officer[16] and a failure to pay it over to the party entitled thereto,[17] and the value of a particular party's interest in particular property.[18]

General rules have also been applied in determining the sufficiency of the evidence with respect to the unlawfulness of a seizure of property,[19] the loss of property,[20] the taking of a proper bond or security,[21] the falsity of a return,[22] a delay in the return of execution,[23] the unlawfulness of an arrest and imprisonment,[24] misconduct in connection with arrest or imprisonment[25] or with making a search,[26] the obligations, or a settlement thereof, between an officer and his deputy,[27] the liability of the sheriff's surety for the act of the sheriff's deputy,[28] an officer's receipt of notice of a landlord's claim for rent,[29] or any matter bearing on the amount for which defendants should be held liable because of the official misconduct or default of which plaintiff complains.[30]

Conclusiveness of officer's return. In an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable the officer's return on process is conclusive as against the officer and his sureties[31] It is prima facie evidence in their favor,[32] but it is subject to be impeached or contradicted by plaintiff.[33]

§ 205. —— Trial, Reference, and New Trial

In actions on the official bond of a sheriff or constable general rules apply with respect to the trial, including questions of law and fact, instructions, and verdict and findings, and with respect to references and new trials.

The rules relating to the trial of civil actions generally are applicable to actions on the official bond of a sheriff or constable[34] Thus, where a demurrer to the declaration in such an action is overruled, and defendant stands thereon, the order for the jury should be to inquire into the truth of the

breaches, as well as to assess damages, and the jury should be so sworn.[35] With respect to the liability of the surety on an officer's bond for the acts of the officer's deputies, it is error, as permitting double recovery, for the court to permit the jury to charge all the injury caused by the joint entry of the deputies against each deputy, and to charge the total thereof against the officer and his surety.[36] In an action for the loss of property seized under legal process, plaintiff may read the record of the case in which the writ was issued, including the writ itself without reading the return of the officer.[37] Where the court has ordered two or more actions against an officer and his sureties consolidated, and a creditor has submitted his claim to the jury, another creditor has not the right to offer evidence to lessen the amount of such claim;[38] but, when a motion is made to distribute the money, an issue may be made to try the question of fraud in any of the claims.[39] It is not misconduct on the part of plaintiff's attorney for him to refer to the fact that the officer is secured by a surety bond.[40]

Questions of law and fact. Questions of fact arising on the trial of an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable are properly left to the determination of the jury,[41] provided the evidence is sufficient to warrant such submission,[42] and, where a finding on an issue of fact is or must be in favor of plaintiff, the assessment of his damages is a matter for the jury.[43] Questions of law are for the court,[44] and, where the facts as to a particular question are undisputed and only one reasonable conclusion can be drawn therefrom, the question becomes one of law for the court.[45] Accordingly, where there are no facts in evidence or admitted in an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable which would justify a verdict against an officer or his sureties,[46] or the uncontradicted evidence shows as a matter of law that they are not liable,[47] a peremptory instruction, a nonsuit, or the direction of a verdict in their favor is proper. Where, however, a breach of the bond is shown, plaintiff may not be nonsuited although the special damages alleged are not recoverable;[48] and in a proper case plaintiff may be entitled to a peremptory instruction on the issue of the liability of the surety on the officer's bond.[49]

Instructions. As in other civil actions, it is incumbent on the court, in an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable, to instruct the jury as to the law governing the case as presented by the pleadings and evidence,[50] and the questions which are presented for their determination.[51] An instruction which incorrectly states the law,[52] or submits questions of law to the jury,[53] or which is misleading,[54] inconsistent,[55] or inapplicable to the issues or evidence,[56] or which unduly emphasizes particular phases of the evidence,[57] or ignores part of the evidence,[58] should not be given; but, where an instruction is not erroneous when considered with the whole charge, no objection can be founded thereon.[59] There is no error in refusing an instruction as to a matter covered by an instruction already given.[60] In an action for the wrongful seizure of chattels, it is proper to submit the question as to the total value of all the property rather than the specific value of each item thereof.[61]

Verdict and findings. In accordance with general rules as to verdicts and findings, the jury's findings on issues submitted to it must be consistent and not conflicting,[62] and, where a verdict is rendered in favor of an officer, verdict must also be given in favor of his sureties.[63] A verdict, in an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable, which states that the jury "find for the plaintiff, that the condition of the bond is broken, and assess his damages at" a specified amount, is proper.[64] Where two or more actions against an officer and his sureties have been consolidated, and the amount of the several claims exceeds the penalty of the bond, the jury should find such fact in a general verdict, and assess separately the claims of each creditor.[65] An omission to swear the jury to inquire into the truth of the breaches assigned is not cured by a verdict finding that the assignments are true, and a judgment on such verdict is unauthorized.[66]

Reference. An action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable is within a statute providing for references in civil suits and actions,[67] but a statute authorizing a reference in a suit on the bond of a sheriff or other public officer has been held not to apply to a suit by a sheriff on the bond of his deputy.[68]

New trial. The failure of plaintiff, in an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable, to introduce in evidence the bond on which the action is based is ground for a new trial, where there has been a verdict for plaintiff notwithstanding such omission [69]

§ 206. —— Judgment and Subsequent Proceedings

Rules governing judgments in civil actions generally are applicable in actions on the official bond of a sheriff or constable.

Rules governing judgments in civil actions generally are applicable in actions on the official bond of a sheriff or constable.[70] In an action against a sheriff or constable and the sureties on his official bond, plaintiff may dismiss as to the sureties and take judgment against the officer alone,[71] or judgment may be entered against the officer alone where it appears that he is liable for the default but his sureties are not,[72] and, where the petition or complaint does not state a cause of action as against the sureties, it is error to render judgment against them[73] or a joint judgment against them and the officer.[74] Where the sureties are severally liable on the bond for distinct sums, the judgment should be against each for or up to the amount for which he has bound himself,[75] and a joint judgment against all of them is improper.[76] Where a judgment is given against the surety for the amount of the bond and against the officer for a greater amount than the bond, the judgment should state that the judgment on the bond is a part of, and not in addition to, the other award.[77]

Where only a single action may be brought on the bond,[78] or where the statute so provides,[79] judgment should be entered for the full amount of the penalty, which judgment is for the benefit not only of the person for whose benefit the action is instituted, but of all others who are or may become interested in the enforcement of the bond.[80] On the other hand, where separate and successive actions on an officer's bond are maintainable by persons injured by a breach of its condition, it has been held that a judgment for plaintiff should be for the amount of the damage sustained by him, and not for the penalty of the bond;[81] but there is some authority to the contrary.[82]

Time of taking effect of judgment. A judgment on an officer's bond ordinarily takes precedence only from the date of its entry,[83] but it has been held that, where the giving or filing of the bond creates a lien, a judgment relates back to the date thereof.[84]

Judgment in amercement proceedings. Under a statute so providing, the surety on the bond of a sheriff or constable may be made a party to the judgment rendered against the officer in amercement proceedings.[85] Such a statute has been held to apply to the state bonding fund when it is the surety.[86]

Assessment of damages. Where judgment is rendered in favor of plaintiff in an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable, and a writ of inquiry is awarded, the quantum of the damages caused by the breach is the only subject of inquiry at the execution of the writ.[87] After judgment by default on an officer's bond, it is not necessary to assign breaches on the record before an assessment of damages may be had under the judgment.[88] A notice of motion for leave to assess damages may be given by any attorney selected by the parties interested in obtaining the assessment,[89] and such notice is properly served on the officer and his sureties, and need not be served on the attorney who appeared for defendants in the action on the bond.[90] On an application to assess damages after a judgment, the officer will not be allowed to set off a claim for fees on an execution in a different case which had been placed in his hands in favor of applicant.[91] Where damages are claimed in behalf of a person other than the original prosecutor, on a special notice before the issuance of the writ of inquiry for the assessment, such damages may be assessed by the same jury.[92] In an action on a bond for the damages resulting from two acts of misconduct by the officer, judgment for the full amount of the bond is proper, although the surety is not liable for one of the acts, where damages resulting from the other act are as great as the amount of the bond.[93]

Execution. Where it is held that judgment must be entered for the full penalty of the bond, execution issues, not for the amount of the judgment, but for the amount of the damages to which the complaining party shows himself to be entitled,[94] and for other official defaults of the officer the persons injured may in proper proceedings procure executions on the same judgment for the respective amounts due them, until the judgment is exhausted.[95] A statute providing that the property of sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable shall not be levied on to satisfy a judgment on the bond until execution against the officer shall prove unavailing has been held not to apply where there is no judgment against the officer.[96] Where plaintiff obtains a judgment in an action on the bond of a sheriff or constable, he may have an execution issued without previous notice to the officer or the sureties,[97] but another person who has also obtained a judgment against the officer is not entitled to have the amount thereof levied on the execution to be issued on the judgment recovered on the bond without proper notice.[98]

As a general rule, except as otherwise provided by statute, plaintiff in an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable is entitled to recover only such sum as will indemnify him for injury sustained by reason of the breach of the condition of the bond.

As a general rule, except as otherwise provided by statute, plaintiff in an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable is entitled to recover such sum, and such sum only, as will indemnify him for the injury he has sustained by reason of the breach of the condition of the bond,[99] provided such sum does not exceed the amount for which the sureties are liable under the terms of the bond.[1] Damages cannot be allowed for a loss which was not proximately caused by the misconduct or default on which the action is based,[2] or for a mere speculative loss.[3] Damages for mental pain and suffering are in large measure discretionary within reasonable bounds.[4] The owner of property wrongfully seized by the officer is entitled to recover the market value of such property,[5] and he is entitled to damages up to the time of trial where the extent of damages cannot be determined at the time of seizure.[6]

tion in assessing the damages,[7] and under a claim of special damages for loss of the possession and use of property, it is error to allow the jury to assess damages according to the value of the property as though the claim were for the loss thereof.[8] In an action by plaintiff in a judgment against the sureties of an officer to recover the moneys collected on an execution, the fees of the officer are not recoverable,[9] except where they have previously been advanced by plaintiff.[10] It has been held that, where a bond is erroneously made to a municipal treasurer instead of to the municipality, it is to be treated as held in trust for the latter, so that the damages in an action thereon are measured by the interests of the municipality and not by those of the treasurer.[11] In an action on an officer's bond for the joint misconduct of two deputies, the allowance of damages for the entire injury caused as to each deputy is improper as allowing a double recovery.[12] In an action by a sheriff or constable on the bond of his deputy the damages to be recovered include the amount of a liability incurred by the officer before bringing the action, although he did not in fact make payment thereof until afterward.[13]

Release of property without sufficient bond. An attachment creditor, damaged by a sheriff's release of the attached property without a proper or sufficient replevy or forthcoming bond, may recover as damages, on the sheriff's bond, the amount of his debt and costs where the value of the released property is greater than such amount,[14] or the value of the property released where such value is less than the amount of the debt and costs.[15]

Mitigation of damages. In an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable it may be shown, in mitigation of damages, that plaintiff has suffered little or nothing by the officer's default or breach of duty,[16] and in an action by the purchaser of property wrongfully sold by an officer the amount of an unsatisfied lien against such property should be credited on the value thereof.[17] Where the action is based on unreasonable delay in bringing plaintiff before the magistrate after his arrest, the fact that plaintiff was convicted of the crime for which he was arrested can be considered in mitigation of damages.[18] Where there has been a breach of duty with respect to the same matter in successive years for which the officer has given different bonds, the fact that the injured party might recover on the bond for the second year cannot mitigate the damages in an action on the bond for the first year,[19] and in an action for neglect to execute a capias ad satisfaciendum, the fact that the debtor against whom plaintiff held a claim might, even after being imprisoned, have paid other bona fide debts, to plaintiff's disappointment, cannot be considered on the question of damages.[20]

Nominal damages. An award of nominal damages, and no more, is proper, in an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable, where it appears that, although the officer has been guilty of an official misfeasance or default, plaintiff has suffered no real injury therefrom,[21] or where actual injury is not averred and proved.[22] The recovery cannot be limited to nominal damages, however, where the action is for a failure to arrest a debtor whose arrest might have resulted in payment of the debt,[23] or for the escape of a debtor imprisoned under a statute providing for imprisonment as a coercive

Property value fixed by sheriff

Sheriff who, in releasing attached property, took common-law replevy bond instead of required statutory bond, and approved bond taken after fixing value of property in excess of judgment and costs in attachment suit, prima facie admitted value of property so fixed, entitling plaintiff in action on sheriff's bond to amount of judgment and costs.—Campbell v. Insolvent sureties on replevy bond

Where sheriff in exercise of ordinary care could have ascertained that sureties on replevy bond were insolvent, attachment creditor could recover from sheriff value of property released under such bond, where value of property was less than debt, since reviewing court could not assume that sufficient bond would have been filed had sheriff not accepted bond signed by insolvent sureties.—Fidelity & Deposit Co. of Maryland v First Nat. remedy to compel payment of the debt.[24]

Exemplary and penal damages. In accordance with the general rules relating to the recovery of exemplary or punitive damages or smart money against sureties, as applied in actions on official bonds, such damages are not recoverable against the sureties on the official bond of a sheriff or constable[25] except where authorized by statute.[26] Where a statute makes an officer's sureties liable for a penalty, to be recovered in summary proceedings, such penalty cannot be recovered in a common-law action on the bond,[27] but, where a statute provides for the addition to the amount of plaintiff's injury of a specified percentage thereof as statutory damages, such percentage is properly included in the judgment.[28]

Expenses; attorney's fees. Under or apart from statutes so providing, the successful plaintiff in an action on the bond of a sheriff or constable has been held entitled to recover, in addition to court costs, the reasonable expenses of the suit,[29] which may include attorney's fees;[30] and reasonable expenses, including counsel fees, have been allowed in an action by a sheriff on the bond of his deputy.[31] However, it has been held that attorney's fees cannot be recovered in addition to the face amount of the bond.[32]

Interest. Although there is some authority to the contrary,[33] it appears to be settled law that, in an action on the official bond of a sheriff or constable, interest may be allowed on the amount for which the officer's wrongful act has rendered defendants liable.[34] The allowance of interest has been held to be within the discretion of the jury, so that it is error to instruct that it must be allowed.[35] actions generally have been applied to actions on the official bond of a sheriff or constable.

Rules relating to appeals and the review of civil actions generally have been applied to actions on the official bond of a sheriff or constable.[36] In an action on a bond, the execution and delivery of which are denied by the sureties, the refusal of the court to permit a full cross-examination of plaintiff's witnesses relative to the issue under the pleadings is sufficient ground, when assigned for error, to present for review the sufficiency of defects on the face of the bond to charge the obligee with notice of the officer's want of authority to deliver it on behalf of the sureties.[37] On an appeal from an order dismissing a petition to forfeit the officer's bond, the terms of the bond need not be set out, since all statutory requirements will be considered as included and nonstatutory provisions read out.[38] Where the reviewing court regards the award of damages as excessive, it may grant an affirmance conditioned on plaintiff's remittitur of the amount deemed excessive, and provide for reversal if such remission is not made.[39]

X. CRIMINAL RESPONSIBILITY

§ 209. Offenses

A sheriff or constable is liable to the same extent as any other person for the commission of any act constituting a crime under the general law, and he is also subject to criminal prosecution for any official defaults or misfeasances which are made offenses by statute.

A sheriff or constable is liable to the same extent as any other person for the commission of any act constituting a crime under the general law.[40] It has been held that in the absence of statute it is not an indictable offense for a constable to fail or neglect to return a warrant issued by a justice.[41]

In addition to his ordinary civil liabilities, as discussed supra §§ 52-127, and to his liability to a civil penalty or amercement, as considered supra §§ 173-176, a sheriff or constable is also subject to criminal prosecution for any official defaults or misfeasances which are by statute made offenses or for which punishment as for crime is prescribed,[42] including, under particular statutes, a refusal to execute a warrant delivered to him to be executed,[43] forcibly entering a dwelling house to serve civil process,[44] levying on exempt property,[45] refusing, on demand, to lay off a debtor's personal property exemption out of property levied on,[46] selling exempt property under execution,[47] bidding at his own sale[48] or becoming the purchaser thereat,[49] refusing to sell property because there is but one bidder at the sale,[50] wantonly sacrificing property taken and sold under execution,[51] failing to pay over money collected by him[52] or failing to deliver prop-

Necessity of reference to record

In action for false imprisonment against sheriff and bondsmen, contention that warrant was illegal because it lacked indorsement for execution in county where plaintiff was arrested would not be considered where plaintiff did not cite evidence in record that anyone executed the warrant in that county, since it was not court's duty on appeal to search for such evidence.—Elliott v. Haskins, supra.

Parties to bill of exceptions

In action against surety on deputy sheriff's bond, where surety vouched deputy sheriff into court and surety alone moved for new trial, deputy sheriff was not necessary party to surety's bill of exceptions.—Maryland Casualty Co. v. Salmon, 164 S E 80, 45 Ga App 173.

Failure to pay over to proper person

Sheriff who delivered collected taxes to county treasurer instead of person entitled thereto was merely guilty of a misdemeanor, under Revisal, 1905, § 3576, and not of a felony, under § 3408, denouncing as a felony failure to turn over to person entitled thereto "all such moneys, funds," etc., latter statute referring to money held in trust for any per-

erty seized to the proper person,[53] failing or neglecting to return process delivered to him[54] or making a false return thereof,[55] neglecting his duty in the prevention of a public offense of which he had notice,[56] failing to fingerprint persons arrested on indictable offenses,[57] allowing the escape of a prisoner,[58] acting as constable without giving bond,[59] or failing to render a sworn statement of moneys collected for the county[60]

A levy of process on property exempt from seizure or sale may render the officer criminally liable under a statute providing for the punishment of unjust or oppressive conduct in his official capacity;[61] but such a statute is not violated by a levy on property of value not unreasonably in excess of the amount of the demand,[62] or by a levy on property belonging to and in the possession of a stranger to the writ, where the officer acts in good faith under a bond of indemnity.[63] A sheriff or constable is within a statute providing that every officer who fails or refuses to perform any duty imposed on him by law shall be guilty of a misdemeanor,[64] and a deputy has also been held to be within such a statute;[65] but a deputy is not subject to prosecution for an act or default under a statute making his principal criminally liable therefor.[66]

Liability for act or omission of deputy. A sheriff or constable is not criminally responsible for a default or a misfeasance of his deputy,[67] except where it is done by the deputy in the officer's name and as his act,[68] and, on the other hand, a sheriff or constable cannot escape criminal liability for an act or omission on the ground of a default of his deputy in connection therewith.[69]

§ 210. Prosecution and Punishment

The general rules governing criminal prosecutions ordinarily are applicable in criminal prosecutions against a sheriff or constable.

The general rules governing criminal prosecutions ordinarily are applicable in criminal prosecutions against a sheriff or constable,[70] including the general rules regulating indictments and informations.[71] Accordingly, the indictment, in a criminal proceeding against a sheriff or constable, must fully and certainly describe and identify the offense and allege the essential elements thereof[72] Each count in the indictment must be sufficient in

Defenses

In prosecution against constable for misbehavior in office, based on illegal arrests and improper institution of criminal proceedings in which costs were obtained from defendants, the failure to comply with statute providing that no action should be brought against a constable for anything done in obedience to a warrant until warrant has been demanded constituted no defense, since statute applied to civil actions only — Commonwealth v. Dempsey, 22 A 2d 76, 146 Pa Super. 124.

Indictments held sufficient

(2) Where indictment of sheriff for failure to perform his duty to fingerprint certain persons arrested for an indictable offense was laid in language of statute and elements were made clear, failure to allege that the fingerprint system of identification had been in fact established by superintendent of state police, which system statute required sheriff to follow, was not a fatal defect —State v McGovern, 54 A 2d 812, 136 N.J. Law 115.

(3) In indictment of sheriff for willful neglect of duty, count alleging that, when citizen made complaint of illegal operation of slot machines within the county, sheriff directed deputy to arrest the guilty person but informed guilty person that deputy was on the way to seize machines and arrest him, sufficiently charged an offense.—Liskowitz v. State, 282 N W. 103, 229 Wis 636.

(4) Indictment charging that constable took money from unknown persons to prevent their prosecution was sufficiently certain —Castle v. Commonwealth, 24 S.W 2d 298, 232 Ky. 561.

Indictments held insufficient

(1) Counts in indictment of sheriff for willful neglect of duty, alleging that at different times sheriff neglected to perform his duties by failing to try to stop gambling and operation of slot machines, but not charging any specific act or omission or describing the operation of slot machines, specifically were insuffi-

itself,[73] and averments in one count cannot aid defects in another.[74]

In an indictment charging official misconduct or failure of official conduct in any respect, whether common-law or statutory, the offense must be charged in direct and specific terms and that it was willfully or corruptly done or omitted.[75] It has been held that an indictment for neglecting to execute a warrant is sufficient if it sets out a warrant legal on its face,[76] and avers that the offense was an injury to the state,[77] without setting out facts showing authority for its issuance; but there is also authority for the view that the indictment must allege the truth of the recitals of the warrant as to the authority to issue it.[78] An indictment for failing to return an execution must set forth at least the substance of the execution.[79] An indictment for failing to pay over fines, penalties, and forfeitures collected by the officer as a part of the school fund need not allege that they were withheld willfully or with a fraudulent intent,[80] nor need the money be denominated as a part of the school fund.[81] Where a corrupt motive is an essential element of the offense, allegations with respect to such motive are not surplusage,[82] and an indictment is not bad because, if they are disregarded, it charges only acts which it was the duty or right of the officer to perform.[83]

Evidence. General rules governing evidence in criminal prosecutions ordinarily are applicable in prosecutions against a sheriff or constable[84] with respect to the admissibility[85] and the weight and sufficiency[86] of the evidence.

Questions for jury. Questions of fact involved in determining whether or not a sheriff or constable has committed an offense are for the jury, in a criminal proceeding against the officer.[87]

XI. LIABILITY OF PARTIES, RECEIPTORS, AND OTHERS TO OFFICER

§ 211. Parties

Where a sheriff or constable, on his official responsibility, and without any direction from the creditor, wrongfully levies on and sells exempt property of a debtor on execution, he cannot recover from the creditor the damages recovered against him by the debtor.

Where a sheriff or constable, on his official responsibility, and without any direction from the creditor, wrongfully levies on and sells exempt property of a debtor under execution, he cannot recover from the creditor the damages recovered against him by the debtor,[88] even though the execution creditor was present at the sale[89] and purchased some of the property,[90] or the proceeds of the sale were paid to such creditor.[91]

contract is sufficient evidence of a legal consideration therefor.[93] The liability of the maker of such a contract is ordinarily absolute, and dischargeable only by act of God or the public enemy.[94] After a legal demand[95] an action may be maintained on such a contract as long as the attaching officer is under a liability to the creditor or debtor for the property attached,[96] and the extent of that liability is the measure of damages.[97] The receiptor cannot be heard to say that the value of the property left with him is less than the sum stipulated to be paid in case of its nondelivery,[98] or that such property belongs to a third person other than the execution defendant.[99] An officer cannot hold the receiptor liable for failure to redeliver the property to him on demand unless the officer himself has become subject to some liability by reason of his failure to hold or sell the property.[1] The approval by a plaintiff in attachment of a person taken as receiptor for property attached does not exonerate the officer from the duty of bringing a suit on the receipt when the property is not produced.[2]

Where the receiptor of attached property refuses to deliver it to the officer, who demands it for the purpose of levying an execution on it, and such refusal is the only reason why the execution is not levied, such receiptor is estopped, in an action of assumpsit against him by the officer on the receipt, from taking any advantage of the fact that no levy has been actually made;[3] and, where the receiptor conceals from the levying officer his ownership of property and suffers it to be seized as the property of defendant in the process, thus preventing a possible levy on other property, he is estopped from claiming the goods as his own when sued on the receipt,[4] although, where the receipt does not admit that defendant in the process is the owner of the property, and the receiptor at the time asserts ownership in himself, he is not estopped to set up such ownership in an action on the receipt.[5] An officer who has delivered attached property to a third person, taking an accountable receipt therefor, is not deprived of his right of action on the receipt by the act of a creditor in executing to the receiptor a writing acknowledging the receipt of the net proceeds of the sale of the property.[6]

In an action by an officer on a receipt for property attached, irregularities in the proceedings in the original suit constitute no defense, provided the judgment was valid.[7] Even the reversal of the judgment on which an execution issued will not bar an action in favor of the officer on a receipt for property taken on such execution,[8] and, if the property receipted for has been restored to the original owner before the action is brought by the officer, the rule of damages is the amount of the officer's fees.[9]

§ 213. Other Persons

Other persons, such as the obligors on a jail limits bond or bail bond, may be liable to a sheriff or constable

In addition to parties and receiptors, as discussed supra §§ 211, 212, other persons may be liable to a sheriff or constable.[10] A sheriff or constable who is subjected to liability by reason of the escape of a prisoner who had given a jail limits bond is entitled to recover against the obligors on such bond for the injury which he has thus suffered,[11] unless the judgment against him was rendered in consequence of his failure to avail himself of a good defense known to him at the time.[12]

stable who has taken a bail bond omits to assign it, and is in consequence held as special bail, and compelled to pay the amount recovered in the action, he may sue on the bond as a common-law bond, and recover from the obligor the amount for which he has been held liable.[13] It has been held that the officer cannot recover in such case until he has paid the money,[14] or at least until a judgment has been recovered against him for it,[15] but there is authority for the view that, where one arrested does not appear and put in bail within the time prescribed by the bail bond, and the arresting officer is ruled against, and attachment against him ordered before bail is put in, he may recover on the bond for such default, although he has not actually paid the costs of the attachment or put in bail to the original suit, or been subjected to any further liability.[16]

§ 214. Actions by Officers

a. In general
b. Defenses
c. Parties; joinder of actions
d. Pleading and evidence
e. Judgment, damages, and review

a. In General

A sheriff or constable who is entitled to the custody and possession of property has a right of action to protect his possession and to shield himself from responsibility.

A sheriff or constable who is entitled to the custody and possession of property has a right of action in damages or otherwise to protect his possession and to shield himself from responsibility;[17] but his right of action is limited by the degree of liability to be entailed on him should he illegally part with the property which it is his duty to hold.[18] Where an officer who has reduced personal property to possession by a levy thereon is dispossessed, he may recover the value of his special interest in the property in an action of trover[19] or trespass,[20] but the mere fact that an officer has process in his hands, no levy having been made, gives him no such interest in defendant's property as entitles him to maintain trover[21] or replevin[22] in respect thereof, or to recover the proceeds of the property from an officer who has seized and sold it under a junior writ.[23] Likewise, an officer to whom an execution is delivered has no right of action in himself against the execution defendant.[24] Similarly, an officer who has taken a bond under an order of court for the purchase price of property sold cannot sue thereon in his individual name without showing by evidence dehors the instrument his ownership, or liability to pay its amount to the beneficiaries.[25]

An officer who has attached property can maintain an action for it only on the ground of his liability to the attaching creditor or the owner for its return,[26] and, hence, in an action by such officer it is competent to show that the property attached did not belong to the debtor.[27] A sheriff cannot maintain an action for other officers' fees placed in his hands for collection, unless he has paid the amounts to the officers to whom they were due.[28] After an officer has made a sale of property, executed the deed, delivered the notes of the purchaser to the person entitled to them, and returned the writ into court, he is without further interest in the matter and cannot maintain a rule against the purchaser to show cause why he should not comply with the terms and conditions of the sale as announced.[29]

An officer who has levied on a debt under an attachment may bring an action to recover the amount;[30] and, where a debtor has fraudulently assigned his property, and the assignee has converted it into money, which he has deposited with a third person, an officer who has attached such money while in the hands of such third person, as far as he could, may bring an action to have such assignment set aside and the execution paid out of the money.[31] Where an undersheriff who had farmed the profits of the sheriff's office directed a person to whom he was indebted to receive quit rents, levies, and fees, and discount them, together with what such person owed on the same account, out of his own private debt, and give receipts, it has been held that on the undersheriff proving insolvent, so that the sheriff was compelled to pay the amount to the public officers, he can recover against the person receiving the quit rents.[32]

Actions by deputies. It has been held that a deputy sheriff or deputy constable cannot bring an action in his own name with relation to matters connected with his official duties,[33] although there is authority to the contrary;[34] but he may maintain an action on a promise made directly to him, although it relates to a matter connected with his official duties.[35]

b. Defenses

Various defenses have been sustained in actions by sheriffs and constables.

In actions by sheriffs and constables various defenses have been sustained.[36] Accordingly, where one arrested on execution in a civil action gives the officer a bond for the liberties of the jail, permission subsequently given him by the officer's deputy, who is also jailer, to leave the liberties, is a defense to an action by the officer against the sureties for an escape;[37] but it is not a sufficient plea in bar that the prisoner remains within the shrievalty and was at all times amenable to the original execution.[38] Where a judgment erroneously supposed to be a lien on property sold by an officer is paid by him out of the proceeds of the sale, it is a good defense to an action by the officer on the refunding receipt taken from the judgment creditor that the officer has purchased from the execution defendant the realty, on which the judgment is clearly a lien, and has agreed to pay it off as part of the consideration.[39]

Limitations. The right of action of a sheriff or constable against a receiptor who has undertaken to redeliver property on demand accrues on his making such demand, and the statute of limitations then begins to run.[40] Where an officer has become personally liable to lienholders by failure to make a proper return on a receipt given by a purchaser at an execution sale, the statutory period for commencing action on his claim against the person giving the receipt, by virtue of a promised indemnity, runs from the date when the receipt is given and not from the time when the prior liens are brought to the officer's attention.[41]

c. Parties; Joinder of Actions

In actions by sheriffs and constables the general rules governing parties in civil actions ordinarily are applicable. Where two officers levy on the same goods by virtue of separate executions, they cannot join in an action against a person who takes the goods away.

General rules governing parties in civil actions ordinarily are applicable in actions by sheriffs and constables.[42] Where an execution plaintiff has received more than the amount to which he is entitled from the proceeds of a sale made by a sheriff or constable, an action to recover the excess should be brought in the name of the officer;[43] and an action to recover excessive costs paid in an action brought against a sheriff is properly brought in his name, even though the payment was made by his deputy out of the latter's personal funds.[44]

Where two officers levy on the same goods by virtue of separate executions, they cannot join in an action against a person who takes the goods away;[45] but it has been held that an officer and his deputy may jointly maintain an action for the value of property levied on by the deputy, and taken from his possession.[46]

d. Pleading and Evidence

In actions by sheriffs and constables the general rules regulating pleading and evidence in civil actions usually are applicable.

General rules regulating pleading in civil actions usually apply in actions by sheriffs and constables [47] In an action brought by a sheriff as such, a complaint stating that plaintiff is sheriff of a named county, duly elected, qualified, and acting, is sufficient to show his capacity to maintain the action;[48] and, where the action is against a person having in his possession property belonging to a defendant in attachment, a general allegation that plaintiff has title to the property in question by virtue of a levy thereon under an attachment against the property of defendant in the attachment suit, to whom the property belongs, is ordinarily sufficient on demurrer.[49] An allegation that the action is brought by the direction of the court or judge is not necessary in an action by a sheriff to collect a chose in action seized under attachment,[50] or to recover possession of attached property.[51] In an action by an officer on a promise made to him by a third person to surrender the body of a debtor during the life of the execution, it is not necessary to allege in the declaration that there was an officer ready to receive the debtor at the expiration of such term.[52] Where a cautionary judgment has been entered in favor of an officer against an indemnitor, and a scire facias is issued thereon, a plea of non damnificatus is insufficient, since it is necessary that the plea state facts showing a discharge from liability.[53]

Variance. A complaint in an action by a sheriff or constable on a jail limits bond for an escape alleging a judgment and execution for a particular sum is not supported by a record of a judgment and execution for a different sum.[54]

Evidence. In actions by sheriffs and constables the general rules governing evidence in civil actions ordinarily apply.[55] Thus, a sheriff or constable who, in a suit brought by himself, makes title to property under process of a court or magistrate must show that the process was warranted by a regular judgment or regular proceedings.[56] In an action by an officer for the conversion of property of which he was in possession by virtue of a levy of process, he must identify the property converted as that subject to the lien of the writ,[57] and show when and in what manner it was converted.[58] In an action by one officer against another, to recover the price of goods sold on an execution by defendant, but which had been previously levied on by plaintiff, defendant may prove that the suit is being prosecuted for the use of plaintiff in the judgment on which the execution issued which was first levied, and that such judgment was given for the purpose of defrauding defendant's creditors, who are the real defendants in the action.[59]

Where an officer has paid the amount of an execution to plaintiff therein, such payment is not conclusive evidence, in an action by the officer against the execution debtor for such amount, that the officer received the money from defendant, but may be rebutted by opposing circumstances.[60] A judgment against an officer for the escape of a prisoner is conclusive in an action by him against the obligors on a bond for the prison limits, provided they had notice of the pendency of the action against the officer,[61] or appeared therein in season to make a defense [62]

e. Judgment, Damages, and Review

In actions by sheriffs and constables the general rules governing judgments, damages, and review ordinarily are applicable.

General rules governing judgments usually obtain in actions by sheriffs and constables.[63] Where a sheriff or constable shows a legal right to sue and recover in an action brought by him, judgment in his favor cannot be refused because he has not accounted for public funds received or collected by him.[64] Under a statute providing that in an action brought by a sheriff on a bond for the jail liberties, if it appears to the court on a motion in the sheriff's behalf that judgment has been rendered against him for the escape, and that due notice of the pendency of the action against him was given to the prisoner and his sureties, the court must order a summary judgment for plaintiff, it must appear that due notice of the pendency of the action against him was given both to the prisoner and his sureties.[65]

Damages. In an action by a sheriff or constable against an execution plaintiff by following whose directions the officer has subjected himself to liability and loss, the officer can recover the amount of the actual loss sustained by him up to or at the time of the action,[66] but not more;[67] and so, where the claim against the officer remains unsatisfied, he is not entitled to recover.[68] In an action by an officer, on the security taken by him for the liberties of the prison, for an escape, the correct rule of damage is the debt and costs on the execution, with interest,[69] in addition to which the officer is entitled to recover the costs of defending the suit against him.[70]

Review. The usual rules governing appeal and error ordinarily are applicable in actions by sheriffs and constables.[71] Accordingly, objections not raised at the trial of an action brought by a sheriff or constable cannot be urged for the first time on appeal.[72]

XII. COMPENSATION AND REIMBURSEMENT

A. GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS

§ 215. Right to Compensation Generally

In the absence of constitutional or statutory provisions, a sheriff or constable is not entitled to compensation for the performance of his official duties.

At common law a sheriff is required to perform the duties of his office gratuitously and can recover no compensation therefor,[73] although, as discussed infra § 216, sheriffs now are usually allowed compensation under constitutional, statutory, or charter regulations. The right of a sheriff to be compensated for the performance of duties imposed on him by law does not rest on contract, express or implied.[74]

Constable. In the absence of statute or special contract,[75] a constable is not entitled to compensation for services rendered in the performance of his public duties.[76]

§ 216. Constitutional and Statutory Provisions

b. Construction and operation of statutes generally
c. Pensions and benefits

a. In General

A sheriff or constable is entitled to such compensation as is authorized by constitutional, statutory, or charter provisions

In the absence of constitutional restrictions, the legislature may regulate the compensation of sheriffs[77] and especially may the legislature regulate such compensation when express authority to do so is conferred by the constitution.[78] In the absence of constitutional or statutory provisions, a sheriff or constable is not entitled to compensation for the performance of his official duties, as considered supra § 215, but, in the various jurisdictions, the compensation of sheriffs usually is provided for by constitutional, statutory, or charter provisions.[79] Statutes and charter provisions regulating the compensation of sheriffs have been held valid as against various objections,[80] although on certain grounds some statutes have been held invalid.[81]

A sheriff is entitled to such compensation as the statutes authorize.[82] His right to compensation is wholly derived from, and dependent on, statute.[83] He is not entitled to any compensation except such as is given him by law[84] and can recover no compensation for services, although within the line of his duties, for which no compensation is provided by law.[85] The commissions given by statute to sheriffs and other collecting officers are intended as compensation for services actually rendered,[86] and the officer can set up no claim to the commissions unless the services are rendered;[87] but compensation in the nature of salary and payable in any event is not dependent on the performance of duties imposed on, or services required of, the officer.[88]

Constable. In the absence of constitutional limitations, the legislature may regulate the compensation of constables,[89] and, in the various jurisdictions, provision is made by constitutional and statutory regulations for compensation of constables.[90] Such provisions have been held valid,[91] although some statutes have been held invalid on certain grounds.[92] Where a constable is precluded by statute, or by judicially established principles of public policy, from demanding and collecting from the county for his own use a fee for a particular service, he cannot demand and collect it for the use of the state.[93]

Amendment and repeal. General rules governing the amendment of statutes ordinarily apply to statutes fixing and regulating the compensation of sheriffs and constables,[94] as do the general rules governing the repeal of statutes.[95] A constable is not entitled to the compensation provided by a statute which was repealed before the commencement of his term of office.[96]

Acts performed by deputy. When sheriff's fees are given by statute, they are given to the sheriff, although the services may be rendered by a deputy;[97] but, where a writ of habeas corpus is served on the sheriff, the costs for such service belong to the officer by whom the writ is served and not to the sheriff.[98] Where the statute provides that a certain duty shall be performed by the police force of a city, and that deputy sheriffs shall not receive compensation for such service, the sheriff is not entitled to compensation for such service when performed by deputies;[99] and, where a sheriff is allowed compensation by the county for the services of a bailiff, he is not entitled to make a further claim against the county for fees earned by the bailiff.[1]

Services outside of official duties. A sheriff or constable is not entitled to pay for services not required by the court, and outside of his duty under the statute,[2] unless he shows an employment of, or contract with, him in his private capacity.[3] However, it is held that, where a statute, providing that expenses incurred shall be a county charge, requires a notice to be served, but does not designate the person or officer who shall perform the service, a constable who renders the service is entitled to compensation.[4]

Unnecessary services. A sheriff who in the performance of a duty does more than is necessary will not be allowed fees for the extra and superfluous services;[5] but a constable is entitled to compensation for each warrant that he executes, even though the magistrate unduly multiplies warrants.[6]

b. Construction and Operation of Statutes Generally

The general rules governing the construction and operation of statutes ordinarily are applicable to statutes regulating the compensation of sheriffs and constables

General rules governing the construction and operation of statutes ordinarily are applicable to statutes regulating the compensation of sheriffs and constables.[7] The courts will give effect to the legislative intent,[8] and adopt such a construction as will give effect to all the words of the provision in question.[9] Such statutes are, as a rule, prospective only in their operation,[10] and generally,[11] although not always,[12] apply only to officers subsequently elected or appointed, and not to present incumbents. Also, such statutes will be construed so to conform to, rather than to conflict with, the constitution,[13] where such a construction is proper and reasonable.[14]

One or more statutes. Where there is only one statute fixing the fees of constables, that is the only statute to be construed in determining the fees of a constable for services performed other than as a sheriff's officer.[15] While two statutes in respect of the compensation of sheriffs will be construed so as to give effect to both, if possible,[16] in so far as they may be in conflict, a subsequent local act will prevail over a general law[17] In ascertaining the intention of the legislature with respect to a statute establishing a fee bill a contemporaneous construction put on the same words of a previous fee bill should be taken into consideration;[18] but the fact that the words of a statute differ from the words of a prior statute on the same subject is indicative of a legislative intent that they shall have a different meaning[19]

Liberal or strict construction. Statutes relating to the compensations of sheriffs are sometimes strictly construed by reason of the fact that they are in derogation of the common law,[20] or give costs in criminal prosecutions.[21]

c. Pensions and Benefits

Sheriffs and constables and their deputies and assistants are entitled to such pensions and benefits as may be provided for them by statute.

Sheriffs and constables and their deputies and assistants are entitled to pensions and benefits to the extent that provisions have been made for them by statute[22] A deputy sheriff who performs the usual duties of that office is a peace officer within a statute providing for disability benefits to peace officers.[23] On the other hand, it has been held that a deputy sheriff is not a county employee within a county employees' pension act[24] Where an officer, such as a deputy sheriff, has no right to benefits under the statute, he is entitled to a refund for the contributions made to the benefit fund.[25]

§ 217. Salary or Fees

According to the local statutes a sheriff or constable is compensated either by fees or commissions for particular services performed, or by a fixed salary or by both fees and salary.

According to the statute in force at the time in the county of which he is an officer, and the effect accorded thereto, a sheriff is variously compensated by fees or commissions for particular services performed,[26] by a fixed salary,[27] or by both fees and salary.[28] Statutes, changing the mode of compensating a sheriff from a fee system to a salary in lieu of fees, will be accorded effect,[29] as will also statutes authorizing the county board of a county to change the method of compensating the sheriff of that county[30] local statutes constables are compensated by fees[31] or are paid salaries.[32]

§ 218. Amount of Compensation

A sheriff or constable is entitled to the amount of compensation fixed by, or in pursuance of, law.

In the absence of constitutional restrictions, the legislature may fix and regulate the amount of compensation of sheriffs and constables[33] and in the various jurisdictions the amount of compensation of such officers usually is prescribed by statutory regulations, and such regulations control.[34] Where the office is one established by the constitution, the compensation may not be fixed at such a low sum that the duties of the office cannot be performed by the incumbent and the office is rendered useless.[35] Where a statute expressly allows compensation for certain services but fails to fix the amount, a reasonable compensation should be allowed,[36] and in fixing it the compensation fixed by another statute for the performance of a similar duty is properly taken as indicating the legislative measure.[37]

The officer is entitled to the amount of compensation fixed by law;[38] but he is entitled only to such amount,[39] and, if a salary is fixed, he cannot recover additional compensation for any service within the line of his official duty.[40] A statute providing for an additional allowance to sheriffs in counties wherein sheriff's fees are regulated by a general law is not available to a sheriff whose fees and compensation are regulated by a special act, rather than a general law,[41] and a statute entitling a sheriff to prescribed additional compensation annually where the county does not furnish him a residence does not apply where the county furnishes him a suitable and satisfactory residence.[42]

Where the salary or fees of a sheriff and the salary or fees of a constable are fixed and regulated by statute separately and specifically, the compensation prescribed for the one officer ordinarily does not apply to the other officer.[43] Under some statutes, however, it is expressly provided that a constable is entitled to such fees as are allowed sheriffs for like services.[44] Where the sheriff performs the duties of a constable, he is entitled to such

44. Scope of enactment Statutory provision allowing constables fees "allowed sheriffs for like compensation as the statute authorizes[45] which may, under the local statute, be fees for services of a sheriff.[46] On the other hand, where the statute restricts the sheriff to the same compensation which the constable would be entitled to for the same service, the compensation of the sheriff in performing the duties of a constable is measured by the allowance to which the constable would be entitled for discharging the same duties.[47] A constable who performs the duties of a sheriff is entitled to the allowance fixed by the statute,[48] which may, under the local statute, be the same compensation to which the sheriff would be entitled.[49] Furthermore, it has been held that a constable who renders services which pertain to the office of sheriff acts as a sheriff's officer and not as a constable, and is entitled to compensation according to the sheriff's fee bill.[50]

Amount fixed by county board. Some statutes confer power on the county board to fix the amount of compensation of sheriffs and constables.[51] The statutes sometimes provide that in case of the board's failure to fix the compensation of such officers, their compensation shall be the same as that received by their immediate predecessor in office.[52] A statute giving to the sheriff for services not otherwise provided for such sums as the board of supervisors may allow does not apply to services performed by the sheriff when not acting in his official capacity.[53]

Under some statutes the decision of the county board in fixing the amount of a sheriff's salary may be reviewed on appeal to a court and the court, on hearing such appeal, summarily determines the amount of salary to be paid to the sheriff.[54] In determining the amount of a sheriff's salary on appeal the court is necessarily vested with wide discretion,[55] and the court may fix the salary in an amount greater than that suggested by the sheriff to the county board in his request for a salary adjustment.[56]

Statutory limitations. Some statutes limit the amount of the salary, fees, or other compensation which a sheriff or constable may be allowed or receive, and such statutes will be given effect when applicable.[57] Thus, under various statutes, the compensation is to be fixed according to population,[58] or in a given amount but in any month not to exceed

the amount paid into the general fund of the county by the officer,[59] or in excess of a certain percentage of the gross receipts of the office.[60] The sums received by a sheriff for the boarding of prisoners are not "fees" to be taken into consideration in applying a statutory limitation of the amount of the fees which he may receive for any one year.[61]

Per diem compensation Where the compensation for certain services is fixed at a certain amount per day, a day's time in the performance of such duties includes all the time in which the sheriff may be so engaged in the single calendar day.[62]

Excessive fees or charges. A sheriff or constable will not be allowed to make excessive charges or to collect excessive fees;[63] but, although the unlawful excess of fees charged by an officer for serving the writ of a prior attaching creditor, and taxed in the bill of costs, has absorbed the debtor's property to the injury of a subsequent attaching creditor, the latter can maintain no action against the officer for the injury.[64]

§ 219. —— Agreements

Where the compensation of a sheriff or constable for services which it is his duty to perform is fixed by statute, he may not recover on a contract for a greater compensation or on quantum meruit for such services a sum in excess of that allowed by statute.

Where the compensation of the sheriff for certain services which it is his duty to perform is fixed by statute, the sheriff cannot recover on a contract for a greater compensation;[65] nor can be recover on a quantum meruit for such services a sum in excess of that allowed by the statute.[66] Where the compensation of the officer is fixed by law, he cannot be required to accept a smaller amount even by agreement.[67] When such an officer performs services which it is not his duty to perform, although of such character as appertain to his office, he may recover compensation contracted for,[68] or a reasonable compensation, where there is a general promise to pay and no express contract as to amount;[69] and it has been held that, where no question as to the legality of the agreement is presented, a sheriff who entered into an agreement with the county which clearly comprehended and embraced his compensation for the discharge of his official duties, and thereafter collected, accepted, and retained the full amount of the agreed compensation, may not recover additional compensation.[70]

Cumberland, 26 Pa Super. 610.

Officer held not estopped

Constable was not estopped to demand specific compensation because he collected and retained fees under old system, where no one knew, because of lack of official announcement, that, because of increase in population, township passed from fee to compensation basis.—Broyles v. Mahaska County, 239 N W. 1, 213 Iowa 345.

Failure to claim fees

(1) Where a sheriff files his account for fees for a certain service, and accepts the amount allowed by the county board, he may not afterward recover additional fees for the same service which he omitted to claim in his first account—Gila County v. Thompson, 37 P. 22, 4 Ariz. 180.

(2) Where a sheriff who has performed services in redeeming from a foreclosure sale states, without any intention to deceive and on the advice of the persons interested in making the redemption, that his fees are a certain amount, and settles for officer of an amount less than the salary fixed by statute does not constitute a waiver or estoppel as to the balance.[72] Under some statutes, however, it is expressly provided that an officer who signs on a pay roll a receipt for moneys paid for official services and who does not at the same time write that the amount received is received under protest is barred from recovering any additional compensation to which he might otherwise be entitled.[73] An officer's acceptance under an invalid special law of compensation in a lesser amount than that to which he was actually entitled under the general law does not constitute a waiver or estoppel of the officer's right to claim compensation under the general law.[74]

§ 221. Particular Matters Affecting Compensation or Right Thereto

a. In general
b. Settlement between parties

a. In General

The compensation of a sheriff or constable or his right thereto may be affected by various matters, such as his residence or the place of performing his services.

Various matters may or may not affect the compensation of a sheriff or constable or his right thereto.[75] An unauthorized appointment of a special sheriff, and the execution of process wrongfully issued to him, will not deprive the sheriff of the emoluments attached by law to his office;[76] and he will be entitled to recover from the county the compensation fixed by law for the service of such process, if it has not already been paid by the county to the special officer.[77]

Place of performing services. All fees prescribed by law for the compensation of a sheriff relate to duties performed within the state,[78] and, where compensation for services rendered beyond the state is not allowed him by statute, he is not lawfully entitled to collect therefor.[79] A constable is without remedy for the collection of fees for the performance of duties in a precinct without his jurisdiction.[80]

b. Settlement between Parties

The sheriff generally is entitled to his fees or commissions where the parties compromise or settle the debt without a sale after the service or levy of an execution or attachment.

The sheriff is not entitled to any commissions on money paid to a judgment creditor before execution is issued,[81] and even after execution is issued payment to or settlement or compromise with the execution creditor before the execution is served or levied defeats the sheriff's right to commissions.[82] Except in some jurisdictions,[83] however, if a debt is compromised or settled between the parties after the levy of an execution, the sheriff is entitled to his fees or commissions,[84] and, in order to make them, he may sell as much as is necessary of the property levied on.[85] The general rule in such case is that the sheriff shall receive the same compensa-such amount, he is not estopped from claiming more fees on discovering that he is entitled to more than he stated—Sharvey v. Rust, 52 N.W. 277, 50 Minn. 97.

tion as though the service begun had been actually consummated.[86] So, also, where the debt is settled between the parties after the service or levy of an attachment, the sheriff is entitled to commissions[87] at the rate allowed on executions,[88] on the value of the property attached,[89] not exceeding the sum at which the settlement is made,[90] and also to be repaid his necessary disbursements;[91] and the statutes sometimes permit him to retain the property levied on until his fees and commissions are paid.[92] In order to entitle the sheriff to compensation on the ground that the debt has been settled, although the money has not passed through his hands, it is necessary that the debt should be paid by or for defendant.[93] Where the amount of an execution is paid by the debtor to the execution plaintiff after the return day of the writ, the sheriff is not entitled to commissions, since the money was not made by him.[94]

One half of commission. Statutes providing that, when an attachment or execution which has been levied is settled between the parties without a sale, the sheriff is entitled to one half of the commission allowed in case of a sale will be given effect.[95] Where such half commission is allowed in case of an attachment on the demand sued on it must be computed on the amount really due and paid and accepted on the settlement,[96] rather than the amount for which the attachment was sued out,[97] but, where the levy was sufficient to satisfy the claim of plaintiff in full, he cannot deprive the sheriff of all or a part of his commission by remitting all or part of the amount really due him from defendant.[98]

Where property is sold in foreclosure proceedings to the second mortgagee, but under an arrangement between him and the first mortgagee their claims are to be satisfied of record without any money being collected and paid by the sheriff, the latter is not entitled to poundage.[99]

Lack of consideration. The sheriff is not entitled to poundage where no sum is paid in settlement, and no consideration passes from defendant to plaintiff for the discontinuance of the action[1] or the making of a stipulation that plaintiff has no cause of action under the complaint.[2]

Statutory fees for services rendered. A settlement between the parties cannot deprive the sheriff of his right to the statutory fees for the services actually rendered by him.[3]

§ 222. —— Expiration of Term of Office

After the expiration of his term of office a sheriff may sue for fees and commissions in an attachment concluded during his term.

A sheriff, after expiration of his term of office, may sue for fees and commissions in an attachment concluded during his term,[4] but, where an attachment is levied by a sheriff and the property released on a forthcoming bond, and, the attachment being sustained, the proceeds of the property are paid to, and disbursed by, the successor of the sheriff who levied the attachment, such successor, and not the former sheriff, is entitled to the commissions.[5] Where, after a jury have been summoned, but before the return day of the venire, the sheriff goes out of office, he is entitled to the fees for summoning the jury,[6] but not for returning the venire.[7]

§ 223. —— Interest

A sheriff cannot be allowed interest on a claim against the county for services until his account has been presented to the county board for allowance.

§ 224. Penalties and Forfeitures

Under statutory regulation a sheriff or constable who claims or exacts illegal or excessive fees forfeits his fees or subjects himself to a penalty.

Under some statutes a sheriff or constable who claims or exacts illegal or excessive fees forfeits his fees[10] or subjects himself to a penalty.[11] Some statutes provide for the forfeiture of the fees of a sheriff whenever he returns a paper or process into court without indorsement thereon of the fees claimed by him.[12] There may be cases to which the foregoing statutes are inapplicable;[13] and the fact that an officer has been guilty of an impropriety in connection with the discharge of an official duty does not necessarily deprive him of his right to his fees.[14] A willful intent to violate the statute has been held necessary.[15]

Proceedings. The general rules governing proceedings to recover statutory penalties usually apply[16] with respect to pleading[17] and evidence[18] Clear proof of an overcharge is necessary to warrant a forfeiture of the entire bill containing the alleged overcharge.[19] The right of action for the statutory penalty for charging excessive fees is usually limited to the person against whom such fees were charged[20] An officer is charged with knowledge of the statutory fees for his office and ignorance thereof is no excuse in a proceeding under the statute for a penalty.[21]

§ 225. Rights of De Facto Officers, Deputies, Assistants, and Substitutes

a. De facto officers
b. Deputies, assistants, and substitutes

a. De Facto Officers

A sheriff de facto has no right to the emoluments of the office for the time he occupies the office, as against one who during such period was the sheriff de jure.

One who is only a sheriff de facto has no right to the emoluments of the office for the time he occupies the office, as against one who during such period was the sheriff de jure;[22] and one who assumes the office of sheriff, being constitutionally ineligible, cannot recover compensation from the county for his services, although he was apparently well elected, and was permitted to serve without any proceedings of ouster.[23] A de facto constable is without right to collect compensation for his services.[24]

b. Deputies, Assistants, and Substitutes

(1) Deputy sheriff
(2) Other deputies, assistants, and substitutes

(1) Deputy Sheriff

A deputy sheriff is entitled to such compensation for his services as may be fixed by statute or by agreement with the sheriff.

service.[25] Where the statute gives the sheriff no fee for a particular service, a deputy who performs such service can claim no compensation.[26] In the absence of constitutional restrictions the legislature has power to provide for the compensation of deputy sheriffs.[27] In various jurisdictions the constitutions and statutes make provision for the compensation of deputy sheriffs,[28] and they are compensated by salary or fees as such provisions may direct.[29] Where a deputy sheriff is regarded as a public officer, he is subject to the same general limitations as any other public officer in the matter of salary and fees.[30] A deputy sheriff who has levied on goods and retains them in his custody after his principal's term of office has expired is entitled to the fees for such custody, until he surrenders the goods to the new sheriff.[31] A person is not entitled to draw pay from the county as riding bailiff for a circuit court and also as an emergency deputy sheriff,[32] and a deputy sheriff has no legal right to receive money paid as a gratuity by a litigant or his representative.[33]

Amount of compensation. The constitutions or statutes sometimes fix the amount of compensation of deputy sheriffs[34] or provide for its determination by the county board[35] or by a salary board[36]

County board and not sheriff
Okl.—Cavin v Board of Com'rs of Garfield County, supra.

Provision held mandatory
Constitutional provision that deputy sheriffs shall have their compensation determined by the county commissioners is mandatory —People ex rel Meyering v. Whealan, 190 N E 693, 356 Ill 402.

The words "shall fix" in statutory provision that county commissioners shall fix salaries of deputy sheriffs on furnishing of statement as to number of deputies required, with recommendation as to their salaries, by sheriff, do not mean "shall establish"—MacNeill v Bazemore, 21 S. E 2d 414, 194 Ga 406

County commissioners must appropriate for, and pay reasonable compensation to, the number of deputies to county officers that is allowed by circuit court rule —People ex rel Meyering v. Whealan, 190 N E 693, 356 Ill 402.

Amount fixed during preceding year
Board of county commissioners, in estimating needs for current fiscal year, was authorized to fix salaries for deputies appointed by sheriff, without regard to amount fixed therefor during preceding fiscal year.—Cavin v. Board of Com'rs of Garfield County, 33 P.2d 477, 168 Okl. 267.

Discontinuance of allowance after services performed
Deputy sheriff appointed under statute was entitled to recover from county reasonable compensation for services rendered in good faith, with full knowledge of officials concerned, before commissioners' court passed order discontinuing allowances for deputies, although commissioners' court could terminate arrangement whereby county was paying monthly salary of deputy or decline to renew arrangement whereby county would do so —Harris County v. Neville, Tex Civ App., 84 S.W 2d 834, followed in Harris County v Hill, 84 S.W 2d 835 and Harris County v. Ogden, 84 S.W.2d 835.

Review of decision of board
Superior court would not be justified in disturbing order of court of common pleas affirming decision of county salary board refusing to fix compensation of deputy sheriff, in absence of abuse of discretion or irregularity in action of salary board or lower court.—Appeal of Ludwick, 178 A. 339, 117 Pa.Super. 471.

or court,[37] or by the sheriff.[38]

A statutory limitation of amount of the compensation of a deputy sheriff which may be fixed by the sheriff or county board will be given effect;[39] but a limitation of the salary of a sheriff to the amount of the fees, charges, and commissions earned and collected by him, less the cost of the conduct and operation of the office, does not apply to the compensation of deputies.[40]

Agreement for compensation. Provided it is not illegal, and in the absence of statute otherwise providing for the compensation of deputy sheriffs, a private contract between a sheriff and his deputy which fixes the compensation of the latter will be given effect.[41] A sheriff may contract with his deputy either for a specific compensation or for a reasonable portion of the fees and emoluments of the office,[42] and under the express provisions of some statutes the sheriff may employ deputies at such salaries as he may fix and agree on to be paid by the sheriff out of the salary and fees allowed to him for his services.[43] Where a deputy is discharged by the sheriff before the expiration of the contract term, he may recover compensation up to the time of discharge, but is not entitled to recover for services rendered thereafter.[44]

Estoppel. A deputy sheriff may be estopped from claiming compensation to which he otherwise might be entitled.[45] In the absence of statute otherwise providing, it has been held that the acceptance by a deputy sheriff of an amount less than the salary fixed does not constitute an estoppel to claim the balance.[46]

Per diem compensation. Where the statute provides that a deputy sheriff shall be paid a certain sum per day for the time actually employed, he is entitled only to one day's pay for a day's work,[47] even though he works more than eight hours.[48] Under some statutes, however, an unsalaried special deputy sheriff is entitled to a certain sum for an eight-hour day.[49]

Bond for fees. Where the statute limits the portion of the fees for travel and services which a sheriff may demand and receive from his deputies, a bond from the deputy to the sheriff, conditioned to pay over a larger amount of such fees, is void;[50] but under such a statute a sheriff may take the bond from his deputy, conditioned to pay over the portion allowed by law of all fees that he shall receive.[51]

(2) Other Deputies, Assistants, and Substitutes

Assistants of, and substitutes for, the sheriff and deputy constables are to be compensated for their services in accordance with statutory regulations.

Other assistants of,[52] and substitutes for,[53] the sheriff are to be compensated for their services in accordance with statutory regulations. Thus, under particular statutes a coroner may be entitled to the fees provided by statute and not to the fixed salary of the sheriff.[54] An elisor is entitled to the compensation allowed the sheriff for performing the same duties.[55]

Deputy constable. The statutes usually make provision for compensation of deputy constables.[56] The compensation is to be paid by way of salary or fees[57] and in such amount[58] as the local statutes may direct.

Person serving process in private capacity. Where a person executes a warrant or serves a subpœna issued by an alderman to him in his individual capacity as a private citizen, he is entitled to the same fees as a constable would have been entitled to receive for executing the same process,[59] and this is true, even though the person executing or serving the process has been commissioned generally as a deputy sheriff without salary.[60]

B. SUBJECTS OF COMPENSATION OR REIMBURSEMENT

§ 226. Service of Process, Notices, Etc., in General

A sheriff or constable generally is allowed compensation for the service and return of process and notices

Generally,[61] although not always,[62] a sheriff or constable is allowed compensation for the service and return of process, notices, and the like.

Service of same process or writ on several persons. Where a sheriff is required to serve the same process or writ on a number of persons, he is entitled to his statutory fee for each individual served,[63] and not merely to one fee for service on all,[64] and the fact that he is unable to serve all does not deprive him of his right to his fees for the services which he has made.[65]

Unsuccessful attempts to serve process. In the absence of a statutory provision allowing a sheriff compensation for endeavoring to serve process, although he is unable to find and serve the party, a sheriff is entitled to no fees for unsuccessful attempts to serve process.[66]

§ 227. Arrest, Keeping, and Transportation of Prisoners in Civil Proceedings

A sheriff or constable usually is allowed compensation for arresting a debtor and committing him under a body execution.

A sheriff or constable usually is allowed compensation for his official services in arresting a debtor and committing him to prison under a body execution[67] or in making an arrest under an attachment issued against a person charged with contempt,[68] but a sheriff is not entitled to a fee for arresting on a capias ad satisfaciendum a person who is privileged from arrest;[69] and the sheriff may be held not entitled to poundage in a body execution.[70]

Where defendant in an action of scire facias against him as bail has procured a constable to attend the court to receive the principal surrender by the bail, errors on the part of the officer in detaining the principal will not deprive him of his right to legal fees.[71]

Arrest or commitment of several persons on same process. A sheriff or constable has been held entitled to but a single fee for executing a warrant of arrest, although two or more persons are named therein,[72] but entitled to the statutory fee for each person committed where more than one is named in the commitment.[73] Where several persons are named in an attachment, the sheriff is entitled to his fee for each person attached.[74]

§ 228. Services in Criminal Proceedings

A sheriff or constable is entitled to compensation only for such services, in criminal proceedings, as the statutes provide compensation for.

A sheriff or constable is entitled to compensation for such,[75] and only such,[76] services in criminal proceedings as the statutes provide compensation for. Where the statute allows sheriffs a sum not exceeding a certain amount per annum from the county for services in criminal cases of a certain class, they are not entitled to any other compensation in such cases;[77] and where the fees of a sheriff for services in liquor law cases are otherwise provided for by statute he may not be entitled to a portion of the fines as additional compensation.[78] The failure of a prosecution because the law under which it was instituted had expired or been repealed before the prosecution was commenced cannot affect the right of the sheriff to his costs.[79]

Executing death sentence. A sheriff is entitled only to his statutory fee for executing a death sentence.[80]

§ 229. —— Search for, or Arrest or Pursuit of, Persons Charged with Crime

A sheriff or constable ordinarily is allowed compensation for making arrests, although an officer otherwise compensated is, in the absence of statutory provision, denied extra compensation for serving a warrant of arrest.

The making of arrests or the execution of warrants therefor, is a service for which sheriffs and constables ordinarily are allowed compensation;[81] but an officer who is otherwise compensated by an annual salary or per diem compensation is not entitled, in the absence of statutory provision therefor, to extra compensation for service of a warrant of arrest,[82] and some statutes are construed to authorize the county commissioners, in their discretion, to disallow fees for serving a warrant of arrest for a preliminary examination.[83] If a warrant of arrest in a criminal action is regular and valid on its face, the sheriff or constable may collect his fees from the county for serving it,[84] notwithstanding any knowledge of his own as to matters affecting the validity of the proceedings,[85] but such an officer is not entitled to fees for making an arrest under a criminal process which states no offense and is therefore void on its face,[86] or for making an arrest in another state,[87] or for the execution of a warrant of arrest with respect to a person already under arrest.[88] Constables have been held not entitled to fees for arresting vagrants, disorderly persons, or incorrigible children, where the persons arrested were not committed.[89]

Arrest of person against whom several warrants issued. Where a sheriff arrests a person against whom he holds several warrants, he is entitled to but a single fee and not to a fee for each warrant.[90]

Arrest of several persons under one warrant. Under a statute allowing a certain fee for executing a warrant on behalf of the state, a constable is entitled to but a single fee for executing a warrant of arrest regardless of the number of persons named therein.[91]

Search for person not found. A sheriff is not entitled to a fee for an unsuccessful search for a person charged with crime under a warrant of arrest lodged in his office.[92]

Unsuccessful pursuit of fugitive. The county board should not allow a sheriff compensation for services in the unsuccessful pursuit of a fugitive from justice within the state, and outside the county, without the certificate of the district attorney required by statute and proof that the escape from custody or pursuit was not the result of the sheriff's carelessness or negligence.[93]

§ 230. —— Transportation of Prisoners

Compensation usually is allowed a sheriff or constable for transporting prisoners to the place of confinement or into court for trial.

Compensation is usually allowed a sheriff or constable for transporting prisoners to the place where they are to be confined,[94] and, in the absence of fraud, county commissioners cannot, on the presentation of a sheriff's bill for services, question his exercise of discretion in taking prisoners separately to the reformatory.[95] Also a sheriff may be allowed compensation for his official services in bringing a prisoner who is confined in jail into court for trial[96] and returning him,[97] but he is not entitled to a fee for each time he may conduct the prisoner to and from jail pending his trial;[98] and in some jurisdictions a sheriff is not entitled to any fees for bringing accused in a criminal case into court during the trial.[99] Where the statutes do not provide compensation therefor, a sheriff is not entitled to compensation for bringing convict witnesses to court.[1] A fee may be recovered for services in bringing back a prisoner from another state.[2]

§ 231. —— Commitment, Custody, and Discharge of Prisoners

Sheriffs and constables usually are entitled to fees for committing persons under arrest and for discharging prisoners from jail.

Sheriffs and constables usually are entitled to fees for the commitment of persons placed under arrest[3] and for discharging prisoners from the jail;[4] but, in the absence of a statutory provision there-

"Committing any person to jail," as used in a statute relating to sheriff's fees for such act, relates to the execution by the sheriff of an order or warrant of commitment made or issued by some officer exercising judicial functions, and not to imprisonment for protection of the officer pending bail, commitment, or discharge of the prisoner.—State v. for at the time in question, they are not entitled to fees for the discharge of prisoners from jail;[5] a statute providing a fee for each commitment and discharge in a criminal matter obviously does not apply to a commitment or discharge in a noncriminal matter,[6] a sheriff is not entitled to a fee for merely arraigning prisoners;[7] and a constable is not entitled to a commitment fee where the hearing is merely adjourned, and accused is detained in custody.[8] Where the statute allows compensation to a sheriff for assistance in executing a commitment to the state prison only when he has a certificate of necessity therefor, a county board has no authority to make such allowance otherwise.[9]

Where several are committed on same charge or commitment paper, the sheriff is entitled to a fee for each person so committed.[10]

Custody; attending jail. A constable is entitled to compensation for holding a prisoner in custody where the case is within a statute allowing him a certain sum per day for keeping a prisoner in custody under the direction of a justice of the peace.[11] However, particular statutes have been construed as not providing for payment to a sheriff of fees for the arrest of persons by highway patrolmen and turning them over to the sheriff.[12]

Under particular governing statutes, a county board has been held empowered to reduce a sheriff's fee for attending jail when occupied by a prisoner or prisoners,[13] without the adoption of a formal resolution,[14] and a turnkey fee claimed by a sheriff for guarding a prisoner committed to jail on a misdemeanor charge, where there was no indictment or conviction, has been held not a lawful charge against the county fine and forfeiture fund.[15]

§ 232. Conveying Lunatics to Asylum

Where a statute so provides, a sheriff is entitled to compensation for conveying insane persons to the asylum.

Under particular statutes and the construction placed thereon, a sheriff has been held entitled to compensation for conveying insane persons to the asylum;[16] but at least one statute has been construed as not entitling a sheriff to per diem compensation for this service.[17]

§ 233. Serving Subpœnas or Attachments for, and Procuring Attendance of, Witnesses

a. In general
b. Amount of fees

a. In General

Sheriffs and constables generally are allowed fees for serving subpœnas on witnesses.

Sheriffs and constables are, as a general rule, allowed fees for their official services in serving subpœnas on witnesses,[18] or executing attachments against them,[19] and procuring their attendance at court.[20] A sheriff is not entitled to compensation for serving an ineffective subpœna which he was not bound to serve[21] or for serving subpœnas in a special grand jury inquiry, authorized by the court, which does not result in any prosecutions;[22] and a sheriff or deputy sheriff who serves a subpœna in his own cause is not entitled to any fee therefor;[23] nor may a constable serve himself with a subpœna to appear as a witness and charge a fee for making such service.[24] Where a sheriff is otherwise compensated, he is not entitled to a fee for serving a subpœna.[25]

Necessity of actual service. As a general rule, a sheriff must actually serve subpœnas in order to be entitled to fees therefor,[26] and a mere offer to serve them is not sufficient;[27] but under at least one statute a sheriff is allowed a fee for diligent search, inquiry, and return not found on a subpœna.[28]

Two attachments for same witnesses. Where, on the same date, two attachments, in different suits, issued to the sheriff, each for the same persons, who had neglected to appear as witnesses, and separate returns were made thereon, they having been served at different dates, and the witnesses produced at different times, the sheriff is entitled to his fees in each case for attaching each person named in the attachment.[29]

Who entitled to fees. A statute fixing the fees to be charged by the sheriff for serving a subpœna confers on the sheriff no exclusive right to serve subpœnas in criminal cases,[30] and, where the district attorney employs a constable to make the service, the constable, and not the sheriff, is entitled to the fees.[31] A sheriff who has appointed a deputy to serve a subpœna has the same right to a fee for service by the deputy as though he had made the service in person[32]

b. Amount of Fees

The amount of fees for serving subpœnas is only such as is fixed by statute.

The amount of fees for serving subpœnas is such, and only such, as is fixed by statute[33] A constable or deputy constable who serves subpœnas issued out of court is entitled to the same compensation as the sheriff for serving subpœnas,[34] and, if the sheriff serves subpœnas issued by a magistrate, he may charge the fees allowed by the constable's fee bill.[35]

Several witnesses named in one process. It has been held that a sheriff or constable is entitled to a fee for each person named in a subpœna and actually served,[36] but it has also been held that a sheriff can charge only a single fee for arresting all witnesses whose names are contained in one warrant.[37]

b. Execution

a. Attachment

A sheriff or constable is generally entitled to a fee for making the levy and return of an attachment, even where the attachment is discharged, annulled, or vacated.

A sheriff or constable is, as a general rule, entitled to a fee for his official services in making the levy[39] and return[40] of an attachment; but he can demand for an attachment no other compensation than the statute prescribes.[41] While it was held in early cases that, if the attached property was not

Part of legislative purpose of statute fixing fees of constable in proceeding wherein attachment, garnishment, or suggestion order is issued against wages of a defendant was to prevent unnecessary hardships against class of people having insuf-

sold, the sheriff was not entitled as matter of right to poundage or commissions,[42] under statute the sheriff may be entitled to fees and poundage on the value of the property where the attachment is discharged, annulled, or vacated,[43] provided there is sufficient proof of the amount or value of the property attached to warrant the taxation of fees and poundage;[44] and he is not to be denied poundage where he has done all that entitles him to it and has done nothing to forfeit his right thereto.[45] Where land attached by a sheriff in a suit to enforce a vendor's lien is afterward sold by the clerk and master under a decree, the sheriff is entitled only to his fee for the levy.[46]

Attachments in different counties. Where, in the same action, attachments are levied or served in different counties, there can be but one allowance of poundage,[47] which is to be apportioned among the several attaching officers according to the proportionate values of the property attached by them.[48]

Two or more defendants or parcels of property. Where there is more than one defendant in an attachment suit, a levy on the property of each defendant is a separate levy for which the sheriff is entitled to a separate fee.[49] Where a sheriff levies an attachment against a single defendant, although on several separate parcels of property, he has been held entitled only to a single fee,[50] but there is also authority to the contrary.[51]

Inventory and appraisement. The making of an inventory of attached property is not a matter for which the sheriff is entitled to costs in addition to the statutory fees for serving and otherwise executing attachment writs,[52] although his failure to file an inventory does not affect his right to poundage fees.[53] Also, in the absence of statute the sheriff is not entitled to charge as costs the expense of an appraisement of goods seized under a writ of attachment.[54]

(4) Necessity of sale

(1) In General

A sheriff generally is entitled to compensation for levying and returning an execution.

A sheriff generally is entitled to compensation for levying and returning an execution;[55] but the rule has been held not to be applicable unless the sheriff has made an actual levy[56] on property belonging to defendant,[57] although there is also authority to ficient property in their own names, from which justice's judgment could be satisfied.—Harshbarger v. Cowgill, 17 S.E.2d 325, 123 W.Va. 667.

other effect.[58] It has been required, for compensation, that the levy made be valid;[59] and he cannot claim compensation for levying an execution which plaintiff has instructed him not to levy or merely to hold to bind the debtor's property,[60] nor, where such instructions have been given and he makes levy, can he charge a fee merely for making a return.[61] A sheriff is not entitled to the fees of an appraiser for assisting in appraising real estate levied on,[62] nor is he entitled to recover from the county for services rendered in executing judgments and decrees of a court which is not mentioned in the statute naming other courts in that connection.[63]

(2) Several Defendants or Executions

A sheriff levying execution against several defendants is entitled to a fee for each; but where he makes one levy against a defendant on several executions, he can charge for only one levy. Where executions go to different counties, the sheriffs thereof must divide the poundage fee on the real debt.

Where an execution is issued against several defendants, the sheriff is entitled to a levying fee for each;[64] but where there are several executions against several defendants for the same debt the sheriff is entitled to poundage fees only on the sum actually due,[65] and where a sheriff has several executions against a defendant, and makes one levy on his property, and enters the property on each execution, he is entitled to charge only for one levy, and not for a levy on each execution.[66]

Executions in different counties. Where executions go to different counties, on either a joint judgment or on several judgments for the same debt, the sheriffs of such counties must divide among them the poundage fee on the real debt.[67] So, where each sheriff makes a levy on property, and by reason of an arrangement between the parties no sale takes place, each sheriff is not entitled to his commission on the amount of the execution,[68] but only to a commission on the value of the goods levied on by him,[69] or, if the total levies exceed in value the amount of the execution, a pro rata commission based on the value of the goods which he seized.[70]

(3) Stay or Setting Aside of Writ

A sheriff is entitled to poundage where, after he has levied under an execution, the writ is set aside, vacated, or superseded. Authorities differ as to whether a sheriff is entitled to commissions where an execution is stayed after a levy.

A sheriff is entitled to poundage where, after he has made a levy under an execution, the writ is set aside, vacated, or superseded.[71] It has been both affirmed[72] and denied[73] that a sheriff is entitled to commissions where an execution is stayed after a levy; and, with respect to the right to constable's fees, a levy has been held valid and effective notwithstanding the operation thereof was suspended by virtue of a prior execution.[74]

(4) Necessity of Sale

A sheriff has been held not entitled to commissions on property taken on execution unless a sale is actually made; under other authority, he does not lose his right to commissions when a sale is prevented without his fault.

A sheriff has been held not entitled to commissions on property taken on execution unless a sale

(2) It has also been held that where, after execution issued, the judgment is set aside on motion of the judgment debtor, and the sheriff does not actually levy thereon, he is not entitled to poundage on the execution, although the judgment debtor has property sufficient to satisfy the judgment—U. is actually made,[75] or, as discussed infra § 240, the money is actually collected; but there is also authority for the view that the sheriff does not lose his right to commissions when a sale is prevented without his fault.[76]

Stay of sale. Under a statute providing that the sheriff is entitled to a fee where, after the levy of an execution, the sale thereunder is stayed, he cannot, under the same execution, be entitled both to this fee and to a fee for making money on the execution.[77] A statute providing that for levying execution when a sale is stayed by a restraining order, after levy, a sheriff shall receive one half the commission for selling under execution does not apply where an execution sale is stayed by a supersedeas bond on appeal.[78]

§ 236. —— Writ of Possession

A sheriff is allowed only his statutory fee, without allowance for extra time and trouble, for serving a writ of seizin and possession in a real action.

A sheriff is allowed compensation for serving a writ of seizin and possession in a real action,[79] but is limited to his statutory fee,[80] and is not entitled to an allowance for extra time and trouble.[81]

§ 237. —— Distress Warrant

A sheriff or constable is entitled to a fee for levying a distress warrant.

A sheriff or constable is entitled to charge a fee for the levy of a distress warrant,[82] but not for a return on the warrant of "no property found,"[83] and he is not entitled to unearned commissions.[84]

§ 238. Custody and Care of Property

A sheriff commonly is allowed compensation for the care and custody of property of which he has taken possession under an attachment, execution, or other writ or order. Apart from statute, the amount of the allowance rests in the discretion of the court.

A sheriff commonly is allowed charges or compensation for the care and custody of property of which he has taken possession under an attachment,[85] execution,[86] writ of sequestration,[87] or order, writ, or requisition of replevin.[88] However, in the absence of statutory provision therefor, a sheriff is not entitled to fees for the care and custody of real estate under levy of an execution.[89]

In order to warrant an allowance, the services must have been actually rendered.[90] Ordinarily an allowance to a sheriff for the care and custody of property can be made for only such period as the property was in his possession,[91] and he cannot recover any compensation for the custody of property where he has never had actual possession thereof;[92] but a statutory provision allowing a sheriff a reasonable sum for securing attached property has been held applicable where the attachment is by lodging a copy in the town clerk's office.[93] A sheriff or constable is not entitled to any compensation for receiving and keeping property levied on where the amount of the execution was paid as soon as the levy was made,[94] and it is not an abuse of discretion for the court to refuse an allowance for the custody of attached property where the officer unjustifiably refused to accept a bond.[95] The risk incurred by the sheriff from the possession of attached property is no ground for a claim of poundage.[96] charges for securing attached property subsequent to the completion of the service and return of the writ may be recovered without having been indorsed thereon.[97]

In absence of proof, compensation is not allowable to the sheriff for trouble in taking and preserving property.[98]

Amount of allowance. In the absence of a statute fixing fees for the care of property by sheriffs,[99] the sheriff's charges must be reasonable.[1] The amount of the allowance which should be made generally rests in the discretion of the court.[2]

§ 239. Sales

A sheriff usually is allowed compensation for selling property under execution or court order.

Compensation usually is allowed a sheriff for selling property levied on under execution[3] or ordered by the court to be sold;[4] but a sheriff is not entitled to commissions on a sale not conducted by him,[5] nor can he be allowed a commission on a sale unless the statute authorizes such a charge.[6] A sheriff who levied on property under a writ of attachment has been held not entitled to a fee for an application by him to the court for the sale of such property.[7]

Sale under void judgment. A sheriff who has sold property under a fieri facias regular on its face, but issued on a judgment which was void because the judge was incompetent to try the case, is not, as against the execution defendant, entitled to commissions.[8]

Failure to consummate, or quashal of, sale. The sheriff is entitled to his fee or commission on the sale of land where he is enjoined from executing a deed or receiving the money.[9] Also the sheriff's right to a full commission on a sale under a fieri facias is not affected by the creditor's subsequent quashal of the sale.[10]

Purchase by judgment creditor. According to some authorities, a sheriff who makes a sale is entitled to his commission even though the property is bid in by the judgment creditor for an amount not exceeding what is due him under the judgment, and the price is merely credited on the judgment without any money passing,[11] but other authorities deny the right of the sheriff to a commission under such circumstances.[12]

Amount and computation of fees or commissions. The amount of a sheriff's fee or commission for making a sale is such, and only such, as is fixed by statute,[13] unless in making the sale he did not act in his official capacity as sheriff, but rather as agent or commissioner,[14] in which case he is entitled to such compensation as is fair and reasonable under the circumstances of the case.[15] Where property is sold in parcels, the sheriff is entitled to but a single fee and not to a fee for each parcel.[16] Also, a sheriff who has sold property under execution and collected the per cent allowed him by law for the sale cannot, on redemption of the property, charge such per cent again.[17]

Advertisement or notice of sale. When it is so provided by statute,[18] but not otherwise,[19] a sheriff or constable may be entitled to a fee for advertising a sale. A fee for advertising cannot be claimed unless there has been an actual advertisement.[20] A sheriff has been held not entitled to compensation for service of notices of the sale of property for delinquent city taxes on parties and their attorneys;[21] but in at least one jurisdiction compensation has been allowed for services in writing notices of the sale of property seized under execution.[22]

§ 240. Collection and Payment of Money

A sheriff usually is allowed compensation for collecting money under legal process and paying it out. Ordinarily he is not entitled to commissions unless he makes the money, and he is entitled to commissions only on the amount which he collects and pays over.

A sheriff usually is allowed compensation in the form of a commission for collecting, and paying out, money under legal process,[23] such as an execution,[24] and where money is collected by a sale of property the sheriff usually is entitled to a per cent of the proceeds of sale;[25] but a particular statute has been construed as not allowing commissions to a sheriff for receiving and paying over money on a sale of real property made in pursuance of a decree and order of sale in a foreclosure suit[26] or on an appropriation award deposited with him pending an appeal;[27] and where, merely for convenience, he receives and pays over costs for which the county is liable and which it is the duty of the county commissioners to pay, he is not entitled to a commission.[28] An officer has been held entitled to poundage or commissions on money made or collected under an attachment.[29]

Ordinarily a sheriff is not entitled to commissions or poundage unless he makes the money,[30] or is pre-

Settlement between parties
(1) Under statute providing that sheriff's poundage fees shall be based on value of property levied on, not exceeding sum at which settlement was made, fact that parties to execution proceeding agreed on settlement of their differences by stipulation, pursuant to which judgment debtor paid creditor specified sum, did not affect sheriff's right to collect poundage on value of property levied on —Nostdahl v. Finnegan, 68 N.Y.S.2d 466.

(2) Under such statute, settlement was held to have been made where, after sheriff's levy of execution, involuntary petition in bankruptcy was filed against judgment debtor—In re Standard Wholesale Grocers, C.A.N.Y., 174 F.2d 594.

(3) Under such statute, where settlement was entered into after garnishment execution had been issued to sheriff, he was entitled to poundage on basis of full amount of settlement, and not on basis of amount collected under garnishee order prior to the settlement.—South Orange Trust Co. v. Paluch, 51 N.Y.S.2d 198, 183 Misc. 681.

Settlement between parties
(1) As used in statute providing that if action is settled before or after judgment, sheriff is entitled to poundage on value of property attached, not exceeding sum at which settlement is made, words "sum at which settlement is made" refer only to money or other benefit received as result of parties' agreement determining controversy between them, where actions were discontinued and attachments vacated by court orders on attorneys' stipulation and sheriff's consent, actions were not "settled" within such statute, and value of gold involved was not "sum at which settlement is made."—Stojowski v. Banque de France, 61 N.E.2d 414, 418, 294 N.Y. 135.

(2) Under such statute, where one of codefendants paid sheriff poundage of two hundred twelve dollars and fifty cents on filing a bond in sum of seven thousand five hundred dollars to discharge attachment against his property, thereafter, on entry of stipulation, settling action in sum of seven thousand six hundred sixty-four dollars and thirty cents, other codefendant was entitled to release of his attached goods upon paying poundage only on the difference between seven thousand five hundred dollars and seven thousand six hundred sixty-four and thirty cents—Martin v. Huber, 71 N.Y.S.2d 195, 189 Misc 405.

(3) Under such statute, where consideration for settlement of attachment proceeding, wherein parties had causes of action against each other, was agreement to offset and cancel their respective claims, the sheriff was entitled to poundage on value of property attached—Morowitz v. Dadourian Export Corp., 39 N.Y.S.2d 39, 179 Misc. 373

(4) Under statute providing that where levy has been made under warrant of attachment and warrant is vacated or set aside by order of court, sheriff is entitled to poundage on value of property attached, not exceeding amount specified in the warrant, where suit was settled for less than amount to which warrant of attachment was limited, but warrant was vacated prior to settlement, poundage due sheriffs who made levies under warrant was required to be computed on figure to which warrant was limited—Smith v. vented from so doing by reason of some act or interference of plaintiff[31] which in law is deemed to be the equivalent of collection,[32] he is entitled to commissions only on the amount which he collects[33] and pays over.[34] Where the proceeds of a sale exceed the amount of the debt, the sheriff is entitled to a commission on the latter amount only[35] unless he applied the proceeds or surplus to other mortgages, judgments, or executions;[36] and under a particular statute a sheriff has been held entitled to no poundage where there is no amount over and above the claim of a purchaser who is entitled to a part of the proceeds of the sale.[37] Where a check has been received and used by the sheriff with the assent of all parties concerned, the commission of the sheriff will not be denied simply because, technically speaking, no money was received or disbursed by him;[38] and, as discussed supra § 239, there is a conflict of authority on the question whether a sheriff is entitled to commissions where property sold by him is purchased by the judgment creditor and the purchase price is credited on the judgment.

Where, before the issue of an execution, the sheriff agreed with plaintiff to charge commissions only on the amount of the judgment after deducting a set-off, to be ascertained in a pending chancery suit, and thereupon plaintiff caused the issuance of the execution, the sheriff is entitled to commissions only on the amount of the judgment after deducting the set-off, and not on the nominal amount thereof.[39]

Levy as effective cause of payment or settlement

Where valid and subsisting levy is made, allowance of constable's fees depends on whether or not levy was effective cause in producing payment of judgment or a settlement, where garnishment against defendant's wages was inducing and effective cause which impelled him to seek adjustment and ultimate settlement, sergeant at arms of court was entitled to dollarage fee on levy of wage execution, notwithstanding operation of levy was suspended by virtue of prior execution.—Morris Plan Co. of New York v. Ashdown, 190 A. 302, 15 N.J.Misc. 185.

Garnishee execution

(1) Under statute entitling sheriff to poundage "upon the value of property levied upon," not exceeding sum at which settlement is made, quoted phrase relates only to tangible property, and where, after garnishee execution was issued on wages of judgment debtor, settlement was made, "levy" included only amount of wages due debtor actually collected, and sheriff was entitled to poundage only on amount collected, and not on full amount of garnishee execution.—Flying Tiger Line v. Spinetta, 76 N.Y.S.2d 67, 190 Misc. 886

(2) Where large part of money necessary to satisfy judgment on which garnishment execution was issued to sheriff was collected by receiver in supplementary proceedings and by means of third-party subpoena on bank deposit, sheriff was entitled to poundage, as provided by such statute, only on amount actually collected by him.—Federal Deposit Ins. (1) Under former statute, sheriff was held entitled to his commission only on amount actually collected by him from purchaser and paid over to seizing creditor, and was not entitled to collect any fee or commission on amount retained by adjudicatee to liquidate first and second mortgages resting on property.—Investors' Mortgage Co. v. Theriot, 7 La.App. 397.

(2) Act of 1928 amending such statute was enacted for purpose of allowing sheriff commission not authorized under prior statute, that is, on amount of ranking mortgages which under code of practice, adjudicatee is not only authorized to retain but sheriff is without right to exact, where mortgaged property was sold free of mortgages for cash and was adjudicated to mortgagee at sheriff's sale, and writ of seizure and judgment obtained by mortgagee were credited to extent of amount of bid, sheriff was entitled to commission on any excess of that amount on price of adjudication of property, as provided by general provision of act relating to sheriffs' fees, notwithstanding mortgagee was not called on to pay sheriff amount actually bid in cash for property.—Prudential Ins. Fines. A sheriff has been held not to be entitled to a commission on fines collected,[40] but he has also been held to be entitled to such a commission.[41] It has been held that the money must actually pass through the sheriff's hands in order for him to be entitled to such a commission,[42] but there is also authority to the contrary.[43]

Automobile license fee or tax. Under a statute allowing a sheriff a fee for collecting an automobile license fee or tax, a sheriff has been held entitled to the entire fee whether the license is for a year, half-year, or quarter-year,[44] but not to the entire fee for each installment paid on one license.[45]

§ 241. Attendance at Court

a. In general
b. Double or multiple compensation

a. In General

A sheriff or constable is entitled to compensation for attending court only when such attendance is in compliance with statute; he is not entitled to compensation for attending courts other than those named in the statute, or for a mere nominal or constructive attendance.

A sheriff, deputy sheriff, or constable is entitled, as a matter of right, to compensation for attending court when,[46] and only when,[47] compensation is provided for by statute. It has been held, however, that where the statute imposes on the sheriff the duty of attending court if required by the judge, but provides no fees for such attendance, it is within the power of the board of county auditors to allow reasonable compensation therefor.[48] Where a fee is provided only for attending certain courts, the sheriff cannot claim such fee for attending other courts;[49] in order to entitle a sheriff to compensation for attendance at court, his attendance must have been required;[50] a constable is entitled to fees for attendance on the sitting of a court only when the court was actually sitting,[51] and, under a statute allowing constables a fee for attending each trial in a criminal case, a constable is not entitled to such fee where there was a plea of guilty, and judgment thereon, and no evidence was introduced.[52]

Regular term or session. Attendance on a day not in the regular term has been held compensable, under statute,[53] but it has also been said that it is only when a regular session of the court, presided over by the judge for the transaction of business, is held that the allowance should be made.[54]

Character of attendance. A sheriff is not entitled to fees for a mere nominal, colorable, or constructive attendance at court;[55] but he is entitled to a fee for attendance, although he may have been absent from the court room several times during the hearing of a case, where it appears that he was within calling distance all the time, and ready to respond to any request, direction, or order made to or on him by the court or counsel;[56] and a constable who was summoned, actually attended court, and was ready to perform his duties as a constable if called on, is entitled to his fees, although he did not actually perform any of the duties of a constable.[57] Where it is a sheriff's duty to be present to carry out whatever orders the court may make, the mere fact that the sheriff may have done no more than to call order in court, guard prisoners, and carry them back and forth to jail does not affect his rights to a fee for his attendance on court.[58] Where a constable is in court to return a subpœna previously issued to him for service, he will not be allowed a witness fee for attendance at court.[59]

b. Double or Multiple Compensation

Under some circumstances or statutes the compensation of a sheriff or constable for attending court may be such as to constitute double or multiple compensation; but under other circumstances or statutes this has not been permitted.

Where the fee bill authorizes the sheriff to charge a certain amount for one day's attendance on the court, he cannot charge an additional sum for attendance at a night session,[60] where the statute allows the sheriff a certain per diem for attendance by himself or deputy, he cannot recover pay for two deputies attending the court;[61] it is not proper for both the sheriff and his deputy to claim per diem or other compensation for attendance on the same court,[62] at least where the attendance of only one officer is required,[63] and a constable cannot recover the salary of a sergeant at arms for attending the sessions of a court where the salary has been received by a regularly appointed sergeant at arms.[64] On the other hand, where there are two judges holding court at the same time in the county, and it is the duty of the sheriff to attend on each, he is entitled to an allowance for attendance before each judge;[65] and where a statute gives the sheriff a per diem for attendance on a circuit or municipal court, and the same statute also contains a provision allowing him a certain amount per day for attending any court or officer with a prisoner, a sheriff is not precluded from recovering the fee for attending a municipal court with a prisoner by the fact that he has charged and received his per diem for attending on the same court on the same days.[66]

Several cases on same day. Under appropriate statutory language, a sheriff may be entitled to a charge for attending court and looking after the prosecution in each case where more than one case is set for, or tried on, the same date,[67] regardless of the number heard in one day.[68]

§ 242. Services in Connection with Juries or Jurors

A sheriff is entitled to compensation for services in connection with juries or jurors only where a statute provides therefor.

While a statute may allow a sheriff compensation for attendance on, or custody of, juries,[69] he can claim no compensation for such service in the absence of any statute providing therefor;[70] and a sheriff who receives an annual salary is not entitled to additional compensation for services in connection with juries.[71]

A sheriff is entitled to a fee for drawing or summoning jurors when,[72] and only when,[73] such services are within the application of a statute providing for a fee. A sheriff receiving a salary may not be personally entitled to fees for such services in addition to his salary;[74] and it has been held that a sheriff is not entitled to a fee for each jury called by a bailiff in addition to the per diem paid by the county for the latter.[75] Where a juror could not be found within the county, and hence was not actually summoned, a fee for summoning him cannot properly be claimed.[76]

Under a statute providing that the sheriff shall receive a certain amount for each juror summoned to attend court, the sheriff is not entitled to receive additional compensation for preparing notices to the jurors,[77] and, where the law requires the clerk to issue venires which the sheriff may serve by reading or delivering a copy, a sheriff cannot be allowed compensation for making copies in addition to the compensation specifically provided for summoning jurors.[78]

§ 243. Services in Connection with Elections

A sheriff or constable may recover compensation for services in connection with elections only as provided for by statute and in the amount allowed thereby.

A sheriff or constable may recover compensation for,[81] and only for,[82] such services in connection with elections as compensation is provided for by statute. The compensation is limited to the statutory allowance.[83]

§ 244. Services in Connection with Bonds

A sheriff is entitled to a fee for services connected with a bond only where a statute provides therefor.

A sheriff is entitled to a fee for preparing, taking, approving, or returning a bond where provision is made by statute for a fee for such services,[84] but not otherwise.[85]

§ 245. Copies of Writs and Processes

When authorized by statute, a sheriff may charge for copies of writs and processes and for attesting them.

When authorized to do so by statute, a sheriff may make a charge for copies of writs and processes[86] and demand a fee for attesting them.[87]

Premiums on official bond
(1) Premiums held not allowable. —Land v. Fayette County, 108 S.W. 2d 429, 269 Ky. 543—Commonwealth v. Nunnelley, 277 S W. 506, 211 Ky. 409.

(2) Act giving sheriff claim against commonwealth for premiums paid by him on bonds executed by corporate surety company is not retroactive, and commonwealth was not required to reimburse him for any part of premiums paid by him prior to effective date of act —Miller v. Sturgill, 202 S.W.2d 632, 304 Ky 823.

(3) Bond required by statute of deputy sheriff or other appointive county officer or employee was held "official bond" within statute providing for reimbursement of premium charged such officer or employee.—Vogler v. Board of Com'rs of Ohio County, 185 S E. 841, 117 W.Va 370

Moneys borrowed; interest
Neither interest on moneys borrowed by sheriff to run office, pending payment of state warrants earned and pledged to secure loan, nor the moneys lent are proper expenses

imbursement and the expenses or disbursements in question are within it; but it has also been held that a sheriff, in making a levy, sale, and delivery of personalty, in addition to his own compensation or costs expressly fixed by law, is entitled to his reasonable expenses, as distinguished from compensation, necessarily incurred in the performance of his official duties,[91] and that if there does exist a quasi-contractual right, not based on statute, under which a sheriff may be reimbursed for expenses, such right would be limited to the recovery of money actually paid out by him in the purchase of equipment reasonably essential for the performance of his duties[92]

A sheriff may not impose on litigants any expense of litigation which is not expressly provided for by law.[93]

The building of equipment by a sheriff to carry out a death sentence, without first requesting the county to do so, or obtaining from the county authority to do so and an agreement to pay, has been held not the proper course to charge the county with liability for the cost.[94]

b. For Care, Keeping, or Removal of Property

A sheriff may be held entitled to reimbursement for necessary and reasonable expenses incurred in keeping and caring for property in his custody.

Except where it has been held otherwise as to property taken on an execution which was not stayed,[95] an allowance may be made to a sheriff for expenses or expenditures in keeping and caring for property of which he took possession under process,[96] such as cattle or horses,[97] or other animals,[98] provided the expenses or disbursements in question were necessary[99] and reasonable[1] and were actually incurred or made[2] However, the expense of keeping and caring for property for the time between the entry of a writ and the judgment cannot be allowed as part of the expense for serving the writ,[3] but should be presented to the court by way of an additional return on the writ before the final judgment, so that it may be taxed in the costs of the suit and included in the judgment, as discussed infra § 254. A sheriff is entitled to reimbursement for the expense of the removal of personal property from the premises in executing a writ of restitution;[4] and in some,[5] but not other,[6] jurisdictions he has also been held entitled to be allowed the expense of a removal of property in his custody from one place to another for safe-keeping.

Particular items for which the sheriff may receive an allowance include the storage of goods[7] and a lock for the room in which goods were stored;[8] but he is not entitled to an allowance for insurance on property in his possession,[9] nor is he entitled to be reimbursed for money paid to recover stolen property as for expenses incurred in the preservation of the property.[10]

c. In Connection with Sale

A sheriff or constable may be entitled to reimbursement for legitimate expenses incurred in connection with a sale conducted by him in his official capacity.

A sheriff or constable may not charge for expenses attending a sale a greater amount than he actually paid out.[11] A sheriff has been held entitled to be reimbursed for lighting the room where the goods sold were during the evenings while he was conducting the sale,[12] and under some,[13] but not other,[14] circumstances reimbursement of the amount expended for advertising a sale has been held proper.

Particular matters held not to be legitimate expenses for which a sheriff or constable may charge include the making and typewriting of an inventory of the goods to be sold,[15] an arrangement of the goods for sale with a view of making them bring a better price,[16] a flag used at an auction sale of property under an execution,[17] and appraisers' fees.[18]

d. Attorney's Fees and Expenses of Suits

A sheriff is generally not entitled, as of right, to attorney's fees incurred by him in connection with his functions; and recovery of particular expenses of suit has likewise been denied a sheriff or constable.

As a general rule, a sheriff is not entitled, as a matter of right, to an allowance of attorney's fees incurred or paid by him for legal advice or services in connection with the discharge of his functions;[19] but, under a statute entitling a sheriff to be reimbursed by the county for any expenses incurred in the performance of his duty, a sheriff has been held entitled to reimbursement for reasonable and fair compensation paid by him to an attorney whose advice, counsel, and assistance were necessary to the sheriff in the performance of his duty,[20] and such a charge may be allowed where the sheriff has discharged duties which formerly devolved on trustees[21] or has rendered services in the nature of those usually rendered by a receiver.[22] A sheriff taking property under execution cannot charge for expenses incurred by reason of an adverse claim to the property,[23] nor can a constable recover the expenses of a suit brought against him for executing a writ of attachment improperly.[24] obtaining in some jurisdictions, where he is entitled to mileage, as discussed infra subdivision b of this section. In some jurisdictions a sheriff is entitled to reimbursement for actual traveling expenses in the service of papers in civil[31] or criminal[32] actions.

Particular items. The traveling expenses for which a sheriff or constable may be entitled to reimbursement include railroad or street railroad fare,[33] sleeping car tickets under proper circumstances,[34] automobile hire,[35] and horse and carriage hire,[36] provided, in the case of a conveyance, that it was necessary[37] and actually used,[38] which facts may be required to be set forth in a certificate.[39] The purchase price of an automobile for use by the sheriff in enforcing a prohibition law has been held a proper charge,[40] depreciation on automobiles and the expense of operating them have been held necessary costs incident to the arrest of criminals which a sheriff is authorized to include as part of the expenses of his office without application to the court for authority to make such expenditures;[41] and the cost of operating and maintaining a sheriff's automobile has been held an expense within the contemplation of a statute authorizing a court to pay the expenses of his office up to a certain amount.[42] The maintenance,[43] but not the purchase price,[44] of horses and vehicles necessary to the administration of the duties of the office of sheriff has been held allowable; but it has also been held that the cost of gasoline,[45] oil,[46] or automobile repairs[47] is not allowable. A part of the purchase price of an automobile which is to belong to the sheriff and not to the county has also been held not to be allowable.[48]

A sheriff has been held entitled to reimbursement for hotel bills while traveling for the purpose of serving criminal process;[49] and if the amount paid for meals of a deputy while serving a venire was a necessary part of the traveling expenses paid it should be allowed.[50] However, a sheriff has been held not entitled to reimbursement of hotel bills incurred in another county or state while there for the purpose of serving a subpœna in a criminal case.[51]

b. Where Mileage Allowed

Authorities differ as to whether a sheriff or constable entitled to mileage is also entitled to reimbursement for expenses incurred for transportation or travel.

Where a sheriff is entitled to mileage, as discussed infra § 251, it has been held that he is entitled, in addition to mileage, to reimbursement for actual expenses necessarily incurred for transportation or travel,[52] but it has also been held that he is not entitled to such reimbursement in addition to mileage,[53] and according to still other authority he is entitled to reimbursement for the traveling expenses of prisoners and insane persons transported in his custody,[54] but not his own traveling expenses.[55] Where the fees and mileage allowed by law for conveying insane persons to the insane hospitals do not belong to the sheriff, but must be accounted for by him to the county, he is entitled to reimbursement for expenses incurred by him in conveying such persons.[56]

§ 249. —— Office Expenses and Supplies

Whether or not a sheriff is entitled to an allowance for office expenses and supplies depends on constitutional and statutory provisions.

Whether or not a sheriff is entitled to an allowance for furniture, books, stationery, stamps, light, fuel, and office or telephone rent depends on the constitutional and statutory provisions in force at the time in the particular jurisdiction.[57] Under one such constitutional provision, "necessary office expenses" has been held to refer to expenses incident and necessary to the proper conduct of the duties of the office of sheriff other than the salary of deputies.[58]

§ 250. —— Pay of Clerks, Deputies, and Assistants

Under varying statutes and circumstances, sheriffs have been held, or held not, entitled to allowance or reimbursement for the compensation of clerks, deputies, and assistants.

Some statutes are construed as entitling a sheriff to be reimbursed the sums paid out to persons employed by him to procure evidence of violations of statutes or ordinances against the unlawful sale or keeping of intoxicating liquors, where the county board authorized the employment and made the necessary appropriation,[59] and the purpose of a statute relating to assistants of sheriffs has been held to be to provide, among other things, for the fixing of the aggregate amounts necessary for the salaries of such assistants.[60] A sheriff has been allowed for guards necessarily employed,[61] but reimbursement for the expense of hiring an armed force to prevent a riot has been denied;[62] a sheriff is not entitled to an allowance for help or assistance in serving or executing a writ of seizin and possession in a real action[63] unless the assistance comes within the meaning of a statute authorizing an allowance therefor,[64] and a sheriff or constable is not, as a rule, entitled to the expense of procuring an auctioneer[65] and clerk[66] to make a sale.

Deputies generally. When it is so provided by statute,[67] but not otherwise,[68] a sheriff on a fee basis is entitled to an allowance or reimbursement for the compensation of a deputy or deputies A sheriff who is paid by a salary may be entitled to deputy hire in addition thereto[69] unless it appears that such salary was intended not merely as personal compensation, but as including expenses,[70] or unless the county board has not by resolution fixed the number and compensation of deputies as provided by statute.[71] The purpose of a statute relating to deputies has been held to be to provide, among other things, for the fixing of the aggregate amounts necessary for the salaries of such deputies,[72] and where the maximum amount that a sheriff may pay his deputies is mandatorily fixed by statute, payment by the sheriff to a deputy, above such maximum salary, for extra work cannot be allowed as an expense.[73] Where the commissioners' court has authorized or approved the expenditure, a finding that the sheriff's expenditures for deputies were necessary, and properly claimed by him as a deduction, is proper, even though he did not comply strictly with the statute regulating the appointment of deputies and fixing their compensation.[74]

Clerks generally Where a sheriff's compensation consists of fees or commissions fixed by statute, it has been held that he is not entitled to an extra allowance for clerk hire,[75] and an allowance for a stenographer has been denied where the stenographer was employed without the authorization of the county board;[76] but a sheriff who receives a salary as compensation for his personal services merely may be entitled to reimbursement, out of the fees collected by him, for such reasonable sums as he has necessarily paid out for clerk hire.[77]

Janitor. Where the county court refused to provide janitor service for the office of the sheriff, it has been held that he is entitled to reimbursement for expense on that account.[78]

In connection with care or keeping of property. A sheriff or constable is properly allowed charges for the wages of a person whom he has placed in charge of property which is in his custody[79] or necessarily employed to look after it,[80] a watchman to guard and protect goods[81] except where they are in a place of safety,[82] keepers, watchers, and gaugers employed about oil wells,[83] a bookkeeper to keep the records of the products of oil wells,[84] clerk hire which is shown to be necessary in connection with the keeping of attached property,[85] and the hire of help to assist in husking standing corn attached.[86]

§ 251. Mileage

a. In general
b. Travel in unsuccessful attempts to perform duty
c. Travel outside state or county
d. Amount and computation

a. In General

Where a statute so provides, but not otherwise, a sheriff or constable is entitled to mileage for actual and necessary travel in performing his duties.

In jurisdictions wherein it is so provided by statute, a sheriff or constable is entitled to mileage for actual and necessary travel in serving or executing process,[87] serving notices,[88] summoning jurors,[89] making returns to court,[90] taking prisoners before magistrates[91] or to the place where they are to be tried[92] or to their place of confinement,[93] producing in court as witnesses prisoners confined in the penitentiary,[94] taking insane persons to the insane asylum[95] or paupers to the poorhouse,[96] posting election notices,[97] and making election returns.[98]

mileage is allowed by statute a sheriff or constable is entitled to none.[1] The specification in a statute of instances in which mileage is to be paid constitutes an implied prohibition on its collection in other instances;[2] under this principle a sheriff has been denied mileage for the use of his own automobile in investigating alleged violations of the criminal law[3] and in investigating and reporting on automobile and other accidents,[4] and for delivering election ballots and notices.[5] A sheriff or constable who receives a salary "in lieu of all costs and fees in criminal cases" is not entitled to mileage fees for services in such cases;[6] and mileage charges have been considered as "fees" within a statute providing that fees earned by the sheriff and uncollected at the end of each year shall belong to the county.[7]

Actual travel is necessary to entitle a sheriff or constable to mileage,[8] the courts have refused to allow any mileage where the entire distance traveled was less than a mile,[9] and no mileage is properly chargeable for travel which was wholly unnecessary by reason of the fact that the process in question could have been served without travel by another officer who was on the spot.[10] A constable cannot serve himself with a subpœna to appear as a witness and charge mileage for so doing;[11] and where a constable is present in court to return a subpœna previously issued to him for the purpose of service he will not be allowed mileage for attendance at court[12]

With respect to reimbursement for mileage, it has been held that county commissioners cannot control the sheriff's method of transportation by compelling him to use an automobile supplied by the county[13] or dictate petty details such as the type of oil and tires to be used.[14]

Additional mileage for transporting person. In the absence of statutory provision, a sheriff has been held not entitled to extra mileage, as such, in addition to mileage for his own travel, for conveying a witness under arrest to a magistrate's office, and from thence to jail.[15]

Indorsement of mileage on return. A sheriff is not deprived of his right to claim mileage for summoning jurymen by the fact that he has omitted to indorse such mileage on the venire as part of his return, where the statute provides that sheriffs' returns may, in the discretion of the court, be amended even after judgment.[16]

Travel by deputy. The sheriff,[17] and in some jurisdictions the deputy,[18] have been held entitled to mileage for travel by the deputy.

b. Travel in Unsuccessful Attempts to Perform Duty

In most jurisdictions a sheriff is not entitled, as of right, to mileage for travel in an unsuccessful attempt to serve process or make an arrest, although the county board may, in its discretion, make such an allowance

In a majority of jurisdictions a sheriff is not entitled to, as a matter of right, and cannot recover, mileage for travel in attempting to serve process or make an arrest which was not actually or lawfully served or made,[19] and even though he ultimately served the process or made the arrest he cannot charge mileage for previous unsuccessful attempts;[20] but in some of these jurisdictions the county board may, in its discretion, make an allowance where the unsuccessful attempt was made in a criminal case,[21] at least where a felony was charged[22] In a few jurisdictions a sheriff or constable is entitled to mileage for travel in an unsuccessful attempt to perform his duty,[23] at least where the failure was not due to his fault.[24]

c. Travel Outside State or County

A sheriff or constable may be entitled to mileage for travel outside the county, but, it has been held, not outside the state, except for the reception and return of an extradited person.

A sheriff or constable may be entitled to mileage for travel outside the county,[25] but has been held not so entitled for travel outside the state.[26] However, a sheriff has been held entitled to mileage for travel in connection with the reception and return of an extradited person,[27] although not for travel in connection with the apprehension without, and return to, the state, without requisition, of a person accused of crime.[28]

d. Amount and Computation

Statutes fixing the rate or amount of mileage and the mode or basis of its computation control. Ordinarily mileage is allowable only for the distance actually and necessarily traveled.

Statutes fixing or designating the rate or amount of mileage for travel by a sheriff or constable[29] and the mode or basis of its computation[30] are controlling. Ordinarily mileage is allowable only for the distance actually[31] and necessarily[32] traveled.

Circular or one-way mileage. Although there is some authority to the contrary,[33] statutes relating to the mileage of sheriffs and constables are generally construed to allow mileage on a circular or round-trip basis, or, in other words, for each mile traveled on the journey, not only going but also returning,[34] and even in jurisdictions wherein the statutes provide that mileage for executing a warrant of arrest shall be "one way" or "in going" only, the officer may be entitled to mileage for travel not only in going to make the arrest, but also in taking the prisoner from the place of arrest to a prison or place of holding court, or before a magistrate, as where, under the construction placed on the statute by the courts, the warrant of arrest is not completely executed until the prisoner is taken to the place designated in the writ,[35] or the statute providing for mileage mentions the execution of a warrant of arrest and the taking of a prisoner before a magistrate as separate and distinct acts.[36]

Performance of more than one service on single trip. Where a sheriff or constable conveys or removes two or more persons, serves process on several persons or in several cases, or otherwise performs more than one service, on a single trip, he is, under the construction placed on some statutes, entitled to full mileage for each service;[37] but under the construction placed on other statutes he is entitled to mileage only for the distance actually traveled on the trip.[38]

C. LIABILITY FOR FEES, EXPENSES, AND DISBURSEMENTS

§ 252. In General

a. In general
b. Plaintiff
c. Defendant
d. Property or assets
e. Compensation of deputies and employees

a. In General

In the absence of a statute providing otherwise, the party at whose instance services have been performed is primarily liable to the sheriff or constable for his compensation therefor.

In the absence of a statute casting the primary liability for costs on the unsuccessful party, as discussed in Costs § 109, the rule is that the party at whose instance services have been performed is primarily liable to the sheriff or constable for his compensation therefor,[39] and reimbursement for his expenses,[40] even though judgment has been rendered in favor of such party and the ultimate liability for the costs, as between the parties, has been cast on the adverse party.[41] A sheriff has been held entitled to recover from a railroad company for money paid to men sworn in as deputy sheriffs at its request and on its promise to pay therefor, in order to prevent apprehended injury to its property from strikers.[42] A statutory right of the sheriff, on the discharge of an attachment, to retain the property levied on until his fees and poundage are paid gives him no cause of action for poundage against one indebted to the attachment debtor.[43]

Statute providing for adjustment. A statute providing that the sheriff's fees and expenses in executing a warrant of attachment are to be adjusted by the judge issuing the warrant gives such judge no power to order who shall pay such fees and expenses.[44]

Plaintiff's attorney. In the absence of notice to the contrary an attorney is personally liable to a sheriff or constable for his fees on process or writs which he commits to the officer for service or execution;[45] but the officer may, if he elects to do so, waive his right against the attorney and look to the client for his fees,[46] and, when he has made his election to look to either the attorney[47] or the client[48] for payment, he must abide by it, and cannot afterward resort to the other.

Prisoner brought up on habeas corpus. Where, at his instance and for his benefit alone, a prisoner under habeas corpus is conveyed from one district to another, he must pay all legal and proper charges of the sheriff for such conveyance.[49]

b. Plaintiff

Where a statute so provides, a plaintiff who procures a sheriff's sale is, in the first instance, liable for the sheriff's fees and costs. The plaintiff in attachment or execution may be liable for the sheriff's fees and expenses in connection with the seizure and detention of the property, as where the attachment or execution is subsequently annulled or vacated

Under some statutes plaintiff, in the first instance, is liable for the sheriff's fees and costs in making a sale,[50] and not the purchaser of land sold by the sheriff,[51] although, as discussed infra subdivision d of this section, the proceeds of the sale may also be liable therefor. The facts that a sheriff has erroneously charged a fee to which he is not entitled and that it has been included in the judgment do not entitle the sheriff to recover the amount from plaintiff,[52] even though the amount has been collected from defendant.[53]

Plaintiff in attachment may be liable to the sheriff for his fees and expenses in connection with the seizure and detention of the property,[54] as where the attachment is annulled, vacated, dissolved, or released,[55] the judgment in the action is in favor of defendant,[56] or, regardless of the result of the attachment proceedings, where the sheriff has placed a person in charge of the property at plaintiff's request and without an order of court.[57] The attachment plaintiff is also responsible for the legal costs of the sheriff or constable in executing the writ, where defendant has no property.[58] However, a sheriff who has attached property at the instance of plaintiff in the suit cannot charge him with the expenses incurred in holding the property after he has been notified that plaintiff has released his claim;[59] and, where the sheriff uses a horse attached by him sufficiently to pay for the keeping, he cannot recover of the attaching creditor for the pay for such keeping.[60]

Plaintiff in execution is liable for the sheriff's compensation where the sheriff has made a levy under an execution which is regular and valid on its face, but has been subsequently vacated.[61] A statute providing for a sheriff's fees for collecting money by virtue of an execution has been held to impose no liability for such fees on plaintiff in execution except those for receiving and returning the execution[62] for which he is liable, in the first instance [63]

In detinue suit. Where the sheriff has, under the statute, no authority to retain possession of property seized by him under an order in a detinue suit, for a term longer than ten days, plaintiff does not make himself liable to the sheriff for expense incurred in keeping the property for a longer time, by insisting through his attorney on such further detention by the officer, on the ground of its being his legal duty to retain the property, where he carefully abstains from making any personal request.[64]

c. Defendant

The defendant is liable for the fees of a sheriff who, on demand, delivers a bench warrant; and the defendant in attachment or execution may also be liable for the sheriff's fees, charges, and expenses in those proceedings.

Where, on demand, a sheriff delivers a copy of a bench warrant to the party named therein, he must collect his fees therefor from defendant.[65]

Attachment. The burden of paying a sheriff's charges for the expense of keeping and selling property attached may rest on the debtor,[66] but not where the sheriff acquired illegal possession of property under color of an attachment.[67]

Execution. Defendant is as a general rule liable for fees and commissions or poundage where money is collected on execution;[68] and this is so notwithstanding execution is stayed by injunction[69] and notwithstanding no levy is actually made [70] However, under an agreement whereby the sheriff waives his fees, an execution debtor, who pays a judgment in full, without levy, is not obligated to pay such fees.[71] Where the levy is dismissed and the execution quashed for invalidity of the judgment, the sheriff cannot recover from defendant the necessary expense of keeping the goods levied on;[72] a sheriff cannot execute against defendant for his poundage fees when the writ of venditioni exponas is countermanded before execution;[73] and it has been held that, where the execution creditor accepts payment or a composition after levy of the execution, the execution debtor is not liable for the sheriff's fees, commissions, and expenses.[74] On the other hand, under a statute entitling the sheriff to poundage and additional compensation where settlement is made after levy by virtue of an execution, it has been held that, after such settlement, the execution debtor is liable to the sheriff for his fees in levying the execution,[75] including poundage[76] and mileage.[77]

d. Property or Assets

The expense of caring for and preserving attached property may, under certain conditions, constitute a charge on the attached property or assets.

It has been asserted that the expenses of taking care of and preserving attached property are a charge on the property or assets,[78] provided the court has made an order for a keeper.[79] Some statutes are construed to contemplate that, for his fees in connection with an execution, the sheriff shall look to the property of the judgment debtor which is held under the execution;[80] and, under a statute imposing liability for the sheriff's fees and costs, in the first instance, on plaintiff rather than on the purchaser of land sold by the sheriff, as considered supra subdivision b, the proceeds of such sale are ultimately liable for such fees and costs.[81] Where plaintiff has given a license to the sheriff to apply the proceeds of the judgment to the extinguishment of costs due from plaintiff to the sheriff in other cases, the sheriff has no interest in the money or judgment until collected,[82] and no right at all as against an assignee of the judgment without notice of the sheriff's claim.[83]

e. Compensation of Deputies and Employees

Under some statutes the sheriff must compensate his deputies out of the fees and emoluments of his office, and a sheriff who employs a person as keeper or guard of property in his custody is directly liable to such person for his services.

Under some statutes the sheriff must compensate his deputies,[84] or his chief deputy,[85] out of the fees and emoluments of his office; but persons summoned by the sheriff under his authority to summon the power of the county may not recover compensation from the sheriff.[86] A sheriff who employs a person as keeper or guard of property in his custody is directly liable to such person for his services,[87] and he may[88] or may not[89] be liable for the services of a keeper, watchman, or other person employed by a deputy, accordingly as the deputy had[90] or did not have[91] authority to bind his principal by such a contract of employment, or according as the sheriff has[92] or has not[93] ratified the employment.

A deputy constable is to be paid by the constable who appointed him.[94]

c. In criminal cases

a. In General

A county is not liable for expenses incurred by the sheriff without authority; the state rather than the county may be liable for his expenses under a statute requiring that they be paid out of a state fund.

A county is not liable for expenses incurred by the sheriff without authority, although in connection with the performance of his duties.[95] Under a statute requiring that the expenses of a sheriff be paid out of a state fund, the state,[96] and not the county,[97] is liable, and the county is not required to reimburse him for payment of such expenses.[98] The county may, however, be liable in the sense that it is chargeable with the administration of such fund.[99] A county has been held not to be liable for the compensation of a high constable.[1]

the county with the duty of providing and paying grand and petit jurors, the sheriff's fees for summoning such jurors are payable by the county [2] A constable has been held not entitled to a fee from the county for summoning a coroner's jury.[3]

Attendance at sessions of court or board. The county is generally liable to the sheriff for his compensation for attending and preserving order in the courts,[4] and it may and should compensate him for attending the meetings or sessions of the county board of supervisors[5] or the county board of review[6] where the board had power to, and did, require his attendance.

Serving notice The county may be liable to the sheriff for his fee and mileage in connection with his service of notice of their appointment on election judges.[7]

Compensation of deputies. A county may be liable for the compensation of deputy sheriffs,[8] but not in the absence of a statute so providing [9] Under some statutes an appropriation by the county board of commissioners is necessary before the salaries of deputy sheriffs become a charge on the county imposed by law [10] Where a statute charges the county with liability for the compensation of all deputies other than the chief deputy, and only one deputy is appointed, the county is not liable [11] A county has been held not to be liable for the compensation of a deputy constable [12]

Where fees do not amount to fixed compensation. Under some statutes where the fees and commissions received by a sheriff in a year do not reach a specified amount fixed as the compensation to which he is entitled, the county is required to make up the deficit;[13] but under other statutes the sheriff must look alone to the fees of his office for the salaries of himself and deputies, and the expenses of the office,[14] and, if such fees are insufficient to pay them in full, he cannot recover the deficit from the county.[15]

Duties and liabilities of county boards or officers. Statutes relating to the payment of expenses incurred by sheriffs, and contemplating some action of approval by a board or officers, may impose a mandatory duty to take such action provided such expenses are legal.[16] Where the statute makes it the duty of the county auditor on presentation to him of a transcript of proceedings containing a bill of constable's costs to examine it, correct the errors, if any, in the charges, and draw on the treasurer for the amount allowed, the auditor's refusal to perform his duty does not subject the county commissioners to liability.[17]

b. In Civil Cases

The county is not liable for sheriff's fees in a civil action.

The county is not liable for sheriff's fees in a civil action,[18] and cannot be made liable merely because he is unable to collect them from any other source.[19] Also, a sheriff who receives an annual salary or allowance is not entitled to extra compensation for services rendered the county in civil causes.[20] However, mileage earned by the sheriff in the service of civil process constitutes a valid charge against the county where it has been collected as costs by the clerk of court and transmitted by him to the county treasurer.[21]

c. In Criminal Cases

A county is liable for the fees and expenses of a sheriff, deputy, or constable when, and only when, there exists a statute so providing. Under statute the state may be liable for the sheriff's compensation or expenses connected with the removal or conveyance of convicted persons to a state prison.

A county is liable to a sheriff, constable, or deputy sheriff for his fees and expenses in connection with enforcement and execution of criminal or penal laws when,[22] and only when,[23] there is a statute so providing; and, where the case is within a statute imposing liability on the county, but there is a statutory limitation of the amount of liability, the county will be held liable within,[24] although not beyond,[25] the prescribed limitation.

State. Under a statute so providing, a state is liable for the compensation or expenses of a sheriff in connection with the removal or conveyance to a state prison of a person convicted of crime,[26] or at least of an offense of a high grade;[27] but in the absence of a statute making it liable, a state is not liable to a sheriff for the cost of transporting to another county a witness in a criminal case charged with contempt,[28] or for his fees for subpœnaing witnesses to appear before a grand jury in cases wherein no indictment is found.[29] Under a statute imposing liability on the state for the payment of expenses in cases of extradition, and in all other cases of felony on the county wherein the crime is alleged to have been committed, the state is not liable for the expenses of a sheriff in returning an accused person from another state where he waives extradition and returns voluntarily.[30] Also, under a statute so providing, on conviction, sentence, and delivery of a person accused of crime, the state is liable for the fees of a sheriff for services in a preliminary trial before a committing magistrate on a felony charge.[31]

a. General considerations
b. Allowance or certification by court
c. Review of allowance or disallowance
d. Services outside official duty
e. Fund out of which payment made
f. Retention by officers of fees and expenses

a. General Considerations

Usually under the statutes an allowance to a sheriff or his deputy for the expense of taking and keeping property or for other charges and expenditures is dependent on his presenting in a proper manner an itemized statement of his claim. Effect will be given a statute requiring such a claim to be audited.

Under some statutes an allowance for the expense of taking and keeping property or other charges and expenditures is based on an affidavit of the sheriff or deputy,[32] or on a sworn[33] statement of claim,[34] or of costs,[35] or on a sworn account,[36] showing in detail all items of expense incurred;[37] and a sheriff may present, by a motion to tax costs, his claim for expenses incurred in guarding and keeping intact property levied on, at least where the property seized was returned to the execution defendant under a forthcoming bond and no effort was made to collect such costs under the execution.[38] It has been held that a charge for storage of property levied on should be presented as an additional return on the writ.[39] Further, under some statutes, in the absence of a waiver,[40] a sheriff cannot recover fees if he neglects or refuses, when required, to furnish a bill of particulars,[41] or the officer's right to fees on mesne or final process may depend on his returning on the process the particular items of his charges.[42] A claim of a sheriff against a town for services in a criminal case should make it appear that the crime was committed in the town.[43]

Fee book. In jurisdictions wherein the sheriff is required to keep a fee book and enter all his fees therein, if he keeps no book he is entitled to no fees,[44] while if he does keep the book he is not entitled to fees which he has failed to enter therein.[45]

Audit. Effect will be given to statutes requiring a claim by a sheriff for compensation for services rendered to the county,[46] in the care of insane persons,[47] to be audited by a prescribed officer; and in order that it may be audited, the statement of claim must be in proper form.[48]

b. Allowance or Certification by Court

An allowance or certification by the court may be required in order to entitle a sheriff to compensation for his fees, charges, and expenses.

An allowance to a sheriff for his fees, charges and expenses incurred in an action, or a certification of their justness and reasonableness, may and must be made by the court,[49] at least where the statutes do not specify the amount.[50] Under a statute entitling a sheriff, levying an attachment on property, to compensation for his services when the action is settled or the attachment dissolved, an allowance for such compensation may be proper on the occurrence of either event.[51] Where the allowance is claimed in respect of the execution of process or writs, it is to be made by the court from which such process or writs issued,[52] and, where the allowance is claimed in respect of the seizure of property, it may and should be made in the suit wherein the property was seized,[53] in which case the same objections are open to the party sought to be charged as though a separate suit had been brought.[54] A statute authorizing a particular court to tax fees and disbursements on the application of the person liable to pay them does not warrant a taxation by such court on the application of the sheriff.[55] However, if the sheriff would make the payment of his compensation for taking care of property a condition precedent to returning a bond forfeited, he must move the court to have the amount fixed by judicial order.[56]

Time for allowance. The court cannot make an order directing either party to pay the sheriff's fees until there is some final determination as to which party is liable to pay them.[57]

Notice of motion for allowance. A motion to the court to adjudge to the sheriff commissions on an alleged levy under a fieri facias,[58] or an application for the allowance of charges for the custody of property,[59] should be on notice to the parties interested.

Sufficiency and conclusiveness. A judge's indorsement, as correct, of a sheriff's account for expenses and fees, not purporting to be an act of court, but merely recommending that the account be allowed, is not an allowance, within a statute providing for the payment by the county of expenses "audited and allowed by the court trying the case,"[60] a statement by a judge in a conversation with the sheriff on the street is not an order of allowance;[61] and a certificate, by a probate judge, directed to the county auditor, stating merely that a person named has served as sheriff in removing a lunatic under a proper warrant and is entitled to a certain sum has been held insufficient in failing to show that the probate judge has ascertained the amount and that he has declared and ordered such amount fixed.[62] Where the statute makes the settlement of a city sheriff's account by the circuit court final and conclusive against the city and binding on all its officers, the auditor has no authority to inquire into the correctness of the settlement,[63] but must issue his warrant for the amount shown by the settlement to be due the sheriff.[64]

In at least one state it has been held that the approval by the clerk and judge of the criminal court of the criminal sheriff's account for fees and expenses of his office does not preclude the city from contesting the correctness of the account,[65] since such approval does not amount to a judicial decree in his favor for the amount of the account;[66] but it has also been held that such approval is conclusive on the city.[67]

Waiver of right to taxation. An execution plaintiff does not waive his right to insist on taxation of the sheriff's fees according to law by signing, after execution sale, an account prepared by the sheriff.[68]

c. Review of Allowance or Disallowance

The discretion of the court or county commissioners in fixing the amount of an allowance to a sheriff will not be reviewed unless an abuse of such discretion plainly appears

The general rule is that the discretion of a court or the county commissioners in fixing the amount of the allowance to a sheriff for compensation or reimbursement will not be reviewed[69] unless an abuse of discretion plainly appears.[70] Under a permissive statute a sheriff, as claimant, may appeal to a specified court from the action of the county authorities in disallowing his claim.[71]

d. Services Outside Official Duty

The remedy of a sheriff, on a claim for services performed outside his official duty, is by action against the person at whose request such services were performed.

If any claim arises in favor of a sheriff for extra services or expenses rendered or incurred on special request, outside the scope of his official duty, his remedy therefor is by action against the person at whose request they were performed or incurred.[72] No allowance therefor can be made on taxation of costs.[73] ticular fund out of which sheriff's fees or expenses must be paid.

Effect will be given to statutes designating a particular fund out of which the sheriff's fees or expenses, payable by the county, are to be paid,[74] and under a statute requiring that his fees or expenses be paid out of a state fund they cannot be paid out of a county fund,[75] except as the statute may provide that any balance remaining unpaid may be paid out of a county fund.[76] The fact that the designated fund is insufficient to pay the sheriff's claims in full is no reason for not applying thereto as much as is available.[77] Under constitutional provisions requiring that sheriffs' fees be paid out of county revenue for the years when the services are performed, a sheriff who does not try to enforce payment of his fees until the revenue for such years has been consumed in payment of other claims cannot enforce payment out of revenue collected in subsequent years.[78] Where a special fund is consolidated with a general fund, claims which were payable out of the special fund are thereafter payable out of the general or consolidated fund.[79] Some statutes are construed not to authorize the payment of insolvent criminal costs to a sheriff out of funds in the county treasury derived from taxation.[80] A state general appropriation bill appropriating money "for prosecuting delinquents for infraction of revenue laws, to be expended under the direction of the controller," does not create a fund available for the payment of sheriff's fees in a suit by the state against the estate of a delinquent state treasurer and the sureties on his official bond.[81]

f. Retention by Officers of Fees and Expenses

Ordinarily, a sheriff may retain his costs, fees, and expenses from the proceeds of property which he has seized and sold.

Ordinarily, a sheriff or constable may retain from the proceeds of a sale of property seized by him his costs or fees in the suit and the expenses of the sale;[82] but it is otherwise as to fees which he has failed to itemize on the return, as required by statute,[83] and counsel fees for defending an action of trover brought against him by a third person,[84] and it is also otherwise where the property seized did not belong to the judgment debtor,[85] or where the sale was made without the consent of defendant and he prevailed in the action.[86] Where the property is covered by prior liens, these must be satisfied before the sheriff's fees can be deducted from the fund realized.[87] It has been held that a sheriff who collects the full amount of an execution has no legal right to retain his commissions out of the amount to which the creditor is entitled by his judgment.[88] Authority to retain moneys collected by him is not conferred on a sheriff by an unconstitutional statute.[89]

Clerk or deputy hire. Where a county board fixes the personal salary of a sheriff, but omits to fix the amount of his deputy hire, he has the legal right to retain out of the fees collected by him the reasonable amount which he has paid for his necessary deputy hire.[90] Also, a sheriff who receives a salary as compensation for his personal services merely has been held entitled to retain out of the fees collected by him such reasonable sums as he has necessarily paid out for clerk hire.[91]

§ 255. Actions for Fees and Expenses

Ordinarily, a sheriff, deputy, or constable may maintain an action to recover fees which he has earned.

Ordinarily, a sheriff, deputy, or constable may maintain an action to recover fees which he has earned from the person or governmental subdivision liable therefor,[92] provided the action is in proper

Attachment plaintiff

If attachment plaintiff is liable for the expenses incurred by reason of his order to the sheriff to levy the form,[93] is brought by[94] and against[95] proper parties, and is instituted at the proper time.[96] A demand is not a prerequisite to the maintenance of the action,[97] unless the action is against the county;[98] and, if it is a prerequisite to recovery by a sheriff of the expenses of preserving attached property at the request of plaintiff in attachment that the sheriff shall have paid the watchman placed in charge by him, it is enough that he has paid with his note[99]

Additional compensation. Under a statute entitling a sheriff to additional compensation where the population of the county is greater than that on which compensation has been allowed, he is entitled to recover such additional compensation in an action against the county,[1] and allowances previously made are not res judicata of his claim for such additional allowances in such action.[2]

Defenses. In an action by a constable for fees for services rendered on behalf of defendant, as plaintiff in another action, it is a complete defense that such action was unauthorized by him and was instituted without his knowledge.[3] Where after a levy under execution by a sheriff the property is taken out of his hands by replevin, the fact that the writ of replevin was served on him by one of his own deputies, and that the latter was guilty of official default in not returning the replevin writ or bond into court, furnishes no defense, on the ground of failure of consideration, to the sheriff's action for his fees on the levy of the execution.[4] The facts that the county, in an action by a sheriff to recover the balance of his salary, if compelled to pay would exceed its budgets and appropriations,[5] and that the sheriff is under a duty to co-operate with the county to reduce expenses,[6] have been held to constitute no defense. In a sheriff's action against a county to recover fees and costs, retained by the county under an unconstitutional statute, an allegation that the sheriff is a county officer and during the period for which such fees and costs were retained was paid all the legal compensation to which he was entitled states no defense;[7] but the county may be permitted to offset salary which he accepted with full knowledge that it was tendered in full payment for his services.[8] In an action by an undersheriff, deputy sheriffs, and certain assistants in the office of the sheriff against a city for alleged unlawful reduction in salaries, the city has been permitted to counterclaim for voluntary overpayments out of public funds to such undersheriff and deputies, to be set off against their recoveries for deductions,[9] but has not been permitted to counterclaim for voluntary overpayments, to the assistants, made from moneys lawfully raised by taxation for the purpose of paying their salaries, at least where they

Where the statute makes the demand of a deputy sheriff for his salary a personal right, the sheriff cannot sue therefor unless it has been assigned to him.—Henry v. Yamhill County, 62 P. 375, 37 Or. 562.

Under a statute making a fund, to which the incumbent sheriff is required to pay the collected fees of his office, subject to his warrant for his own salary and expenses only, no action can be maintained against him alone by his predecessor for salary.—Perkins v. Nugent, La.App., 151 So. 819.

Supervisor of public funds
Where, under statute authorizing such action, the supervisor of public funds has taken possession of the sheriff's salary fund, such supervisor is not only a proper but a necessary party defendant to an action by a deputy sheriff to recover his salary.—Asadie v. Hebert, La.App., 15 So.2d 392.

Poundage
Ordinarily, the amount of the sheriff's poundage arising from his services in connection with an attachment, and the source from which or by whom to be paid, cannot be determined until termination of litigation by the parties in the main suit, by settlement between parties, discontinuance of action, operation of law, judgment, or vacatur of attachment.—In re Groom's Estate, 85 N.Y.S.2d 862.

have not been allowed a recovery for their salary deductions.[10]

Pleading. General rules, requiring that plaintiff's pleading must allege facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, apply in actions by a sheriff or his deputy to recover compensation.[11] So, in an action by a sheriff to recover compensation from the county, he must allege facts sufficient to show an enforceable demand against the county;[12] but he need not plead matters which are fixed by law;[13] nor need he separate the petition into counts where the services rendered were continuous and of the same kind.[14] Where the action is to recover compensation in addition to salary, a paragraph of the complaint containing an invalid claim to fees for receiving prisoners into, and discharging them from, the county jail may nevertheless be held good where it also contains a valid claim to per diem compensation for attendance on the sessions of courts.[15] Offsets, such as those based on the salary paid the officer, must be pleaded.[16]

Where, in an action by a sheriff for official services in levying an execution, there is an allegation of a special request that plaintiff should perform the services, it is not necessary to aver that the sums due the sheriff were not collected by a sale of the property levied on.[17] Also, in such an action it is not necessary to allege the value of the services;[18] but in an action to recover for services in keeping property levied on, a complaint is insufficient which avers neither what the services were reasonably worth, nor that the court from which the execution issued had certified that the amount was just and reasonable.[19]

In an action by a constable to recover his fee for executing in another county a warrant issued by a justice of the peace, it is not essential that the complaint should allege that the warrant was indorsed by a magistrate of the county in which it was executed.[20]

Evidence. General rules are applicable in determining the admissibility[21] and sufficiency[22] of evidence in an action by a sheriff or deputy sheriff to recover compensation or reimbursement for expenses. It has been held that the judge may act without evidence where there is no answer and he has sufficient knowledge of the facts.[23]

§ 256. Time for Payment

Although it has been held that a sheriff may demand prepayment of his fees, it has also been held that in the absence of statute he has no such right.

It has been held that a sheriff may demand that his fees be paid or secured before he performs the duties for which such fees are payable,[24] particularly under a statute authorizing him to do so;[25] but it has also been held that, in the absence of statute, he has no such right,[26] and that he is obligated to perform the duties of his office when required,[27] and to rely on the ordinary legal remedies for obtaining payment therefor.[28] Even where a sheriff has a right to demand prepayment, if he undertakes the service without making such demand, he cannot refuse to complete it until his fees are paid;[29]

nor can he in such case avoid liability for neglect of duty on the ground of nonpayment of his fees.[30] It has also been held that the right of a sheriff to refuse to execute process until his fees are paid or tendered does not excuse him for a failure to make a return of the process.[31] The fact that a sheriff has waived prepayment of his fees does not defeat his right to recover them.[32]

A sheriff may have a lien for his fees and charges on property seized under valid process, but he is not entitled to a lien on property wrongfully seized.

Where an execution against defendant has been returned "no property found," no lien on the property of plaintiff arises in favor of the sheriff until an execution against plaintiff for the costs created by him has actually been issued and placed in the hands of the sheriff.[33] The sheriff does not have a lien, for his claim against the county, on funds which he receives as an agent or trustee to pay over to the county.[34]

On property rightfully seized. In some jurisdictions a sheriff who has seized property under a valid attachment or execution has a lien thereon, and the right to retain it until his fees and charges are paid,[35] although the attachment is discharged by the giving of a statutory bond,[36] or the execution is superseded by the giving of a stay bond,[37] or according to some,[38] but not other,[39] authorities, where, after the levy of an attachment or execution, the debt or claim is compromised or settled between the parties. It is, however, the duty of the sheriff to inform the owner of the property of the amount of his fees,[40] and, when demand for the property is made, to offer to return it on payment of his fees.[41]

On property wrongfully seized. Where the process or writ under which property has been seized is set aside or quashed, the sheriff has no lien on the property for his fees and charges;[42] nor can he sell such property in order to compensate or reimburse himself;[43] and a fortiori a sheriff who has seized property not belonging to defendant acquires no lien thereon.[44]

Waiver. A sheriff or constable who relinquishes possession of property seized by him under legal process waives any lien on such property for his fees and charges.[45]

E. RECOVERY BACK OF MONEY PAID TO, OR COLLECTED BY, OFFICER, AND ACCOUNTING FOR RECEIPTS OF OFFICE

§ 258. Right of County to Recover Back

A county may recover back from a sheriff or constable money paid to him in excess of what he was lawfully entitled to receive.

A county may recover from a sheriff or constable money paid him by it in excess of what he was lawfully entitled to receive,[46] or compensation which he drew without complying with the statute in relating to the allowance thereof.[47] Recovery may be had, according to some,[48] although not other,[49] authorities, even though the payment was made under a misapprehension of law, and according to some,[50]

but not other,[51] authorities, even though the payment was made on the order of the county's governing body, with full knowledge of the facts and without fraud. There may, of course, be payments which are not recoverable from the sheriff by the county,[52] and in equity an estoppel on the part of the county may prevent recovery.[53] The mere fact, however, that a deputy sheriff is, without authority of law, appointed at the request of certain members of the commissioners' court does not preclude the county from recovering back from the sheriff money paid to such unauthorized deputy.[54] It is no defense to an action by a county to recover back money from a sheriff that he has furnished a bond[55] or that the money has been wrongfully taken from the state.[56]

A private individual is not entitled to recover back from a sheriff money paid for his services, with full knowledge of the facts and without legal compulsion.

A private individual who has paid money to a sheriff for his services, with full knowledge of the facts and without legal compulsion, cannot recover back such payment;[57] and, where the money collected under an execution is not enough to satisfy the debt and lawful costs, and the sheriff retains more than his lawful fees, defendant in execution cannot, after paying to plaintiff the balance of his debt, allowing the sum appropriated by the sheriff, recover from the sheriff the amount unlawfully retained by him.[58] On the other hand, one who has, in order to release his property from an execution, paid the sheriff commissions to which he is entitled if the execution is legal, may recover such payment if the execution is in fact illegal;[59] an action will lie to recover commissions received and retained by a sheriff on an unauthorized sale which has been set aside;[60] the excessive portion of a compulsory payment to a sheriff for the services of a caretaker may be recovered back,[61] and under permissive statute a private individual may be entitled to recover back from constables fees illegally collected,[62] including the statutory penalty prescribed for such collection.[63] So, also, a person who entered into a recognizance for the appearance of certain defendants may recover back money paid by him to a sheriff for their return from another state, where the sheriff returned defendants by virtue of a requisition obtained from the governor and received the compensation therefor allowed by law.[64] The wrongful act of plaintiff's attorney in entering judgment and issuing execution when he did is not material on the question of the liability of the sheriff to refund poundage and keeper's fees, where he is not charged with complicity in anything which plaintiff's attorney may have done before the issuance of the execution.[65]

§ 260. Accounting for, and Payment of, Receipts of Office to County or State

A sheriff or constable may be required to report, account for, and pay over, to the county or state, receipts of his office, or at least the excess over the amount allowed for salary, deputy hire, or other expenses.

Even where he is paid a salary the sheriff usually receives fees for his services,[66] but, as a general rule under the statutes, such fees,[67] or at least the excess thereof over the amount allowed for salary, deputy hire, and other expenses,[68] belong to the county, and must be reported, accounted for, and paid into the county treasury by the sheriff.[69] A

statute requiring that the sheriff keep a record of fees received and pay them into the county treasury must be followed,[70] and noncompliance cannot be excused for trivial reasons.[71] Failure of a sheriff to pay over, to the county, fees which he has received is not excused by the fact that he holds office only for the latter part of the term during which the fees have been received;[72] or by the fact that he has paid out such money to settle the debts of the former incumbent of the office.[73] So, also, under a statute requiring a sheriff to account for, and turn over to the county, fees collected by him, it is no excuse for his failure to do so that he has not used such fees for his own personal benefit,[74] or that without complying with a statute he has paid out the money for services in connection with the transactions in which the fees have been collected,[75] and has told the county board of such payment[76]

Under a statute providing that the sheriff shall not perform any official service except on prepayment of his fees, the sheriff must account for all fees earned, whether or not collected[77] With respect to fees as to which payment in advance is not demandable, where services are rendered, he is obligated to exercise the highest degree of diligence to effect collection;[78] and, if they remain unpaid, he can escape liability only by showing that his efforts to collect have measured up to the required care,[79] and the burden is on him to make such a showing[80] This burden is not met by a custom of his office to serve papers, without collecting fees in advance and merely to hold the originals pending payment of such fees;[81] and this is so notwithstanding acquiescence in the custom by other public officials.[82] Under a statute requiring payments into a salary fund, the sheriff is not required to pay into such fund amounts assessed as fines but not in fact collected due to no fault of his[83]

Constable. A constable may, under statute, be required to account to the county for all fees collected and to turn them into the county treasury.[84]

Mistake. Money collected, reported, accounted for, and paid over to the county by a sheriff under a mutual mistake of law cannot be recovered back by him.[85] A sheriff, in accounting with the county for the receipts of his office, will be given the benefit of a statute governing the relief of officers from innocent mistake.[86]

Particular amounts for which a sheriff has been held accountable include amounts received for the transportation of prisoners to the state prison[87] or insane persons to an insane asylum,[88] fees received for committing prisoners to, and discharging them from, the county jail;[89] fees earned in misdemeanor cases,[90] fees received in levying an attachment;[91] fees for serving out-of-the-county process;[92] fees for drawing and making sheriff's deeds for conveyance of land;[93] and fees paid for the seizure of prohibited liquor.[94] On the other hand, it has been held that he need not account for his per diem for attendance at court,[95] money paid him to defray expenses of advertising[96] and printing;[97] amounts received for services rendered otherwise than in his official capacity as sheriff;[98] unclaimed moneys deposited as costs;[99] and the fees allowed to guards and assistants in conveying prisoners to the penitentiary.[1] Also, he need not report money received in payment of a judgment which he has recovered against the county for fees previously earned.[2] Under the construction placed on the constitution and statutes of some,[3] but not other,[4] jurisdictions, mileage fees belong, and must be paid over, to the county.

Accounting to state. Under some constitutional or statutory provisions a sheriff is required to pay to the state treasurer the excess of the amount received by him over the sum which he is entitled by law to retain for his salary and office expenses.[5] Such fees are regarded as charges which the state makes for services which it renders through the sheriff,[6] and the sheriff is considered as a trustee of the state to collect such fees and properly to account for them.[7] Under some,[8] although not other,[9] circumstances he is liable for interest; but he is not required to account to the state for fees and commissions illegally charged and collected by him.[10]

Examination of account; charges and credits. The county has the right to examine the account of the sheriff in order to determine its liability to him.[11] Where it is brought to his attention that among the fees for which he has accounted to the county are illegal fees collected from the state, it is his duty to report such fact to the county authorities[12] within a reasonable time[13] in order that the county can use such means as it has at its command to determine, if it so desires, what offsets or claims, if any, it has.[14] The sheriff should be charged with all moneys and fees which he has, or should have, received,[15] and his account should be surcharged to correct omissions in this respect.[16] On the other hand, in accounting for tax collections he should receive credit for tax exonerations.[17] The sheriff should also receive credit for all authorized expenses;[18] and it has been held that fees improperly retained in one year may be credited in a subsequent

Deputy and clerk hire

Expenses incurred by the sheriff which are necessary for the discharge of his duties and in the necessary operation of his office, such as expenses for the hire of deputies and

year in which they are reported.[19] The sheriff is not, however, entitled to credit for unauthorized expenditures,[20] or for uncollected salary warrants, which are not collected when due because of his own delinquency and obstinacy.[21]

Actions for accounting. Equity has jurisdiction of a suit brought by a county to compel a sheriff to account for moneys received,[22] particularly where the items are numerous and complicated.[23] In an action to compel him to account and pay over to the county fees which he has received, a counterclaim on the ground that he has paid out the money for the benefit of the county is not available where such payments are unauthorized.[24] Actions against a sheriff for an accounting for fees will be dismissed where the emoluments of his office do not exceed the allowance of amounts to which he is entitled as credits.[25] An action to compel accounting by the sheriff to the county must be prosecuted by the county as party plaintiff,[26] and not by a taxpayer,[27] unless the proper county officers refuse to prosecute.[28] General rules govern with respect to evidence in actions to require a sheriff to account.[29]

SHEWER. In the practice of the English high court, when a view by a jury is ordered, persons are named by the court to show the property to be viewed, and are hence called "shewers." There is usually a shewer on behalf of each party.[2]

SHIELD. To cover from danger with or as with a shield; protect from injury, assault, or punishment; as, to shield the guilty.[3] It has been held synonymous with "conserve" see 15 C.J.S. p 984 note 18.1, and "protect" see 73 C.J.S. p 263 note 12.

SHIFT. The noun "shift" is defined generally as meaning change; alteration or variation in kind, character, place, position, direction, or the like; the substitution of one thing, kind, position, direction, or the like, for another.[4] The term is sometimes used to indicate a set of workmen who work in turn with other sets,[5] and also the time during which a particular set of men works.[6]

As a verb, "shift," in its ordinary use, means to change;[7] to displace or be displaced; to move around.[8]

"Shifting" in railroad terminology is the cutting out and putting in cars of in the making up of a train before it is dispatched on its journey as stated in Railroads § 1 r.

SHIFTER. A lever used to move belts from fixed to loose pulleys, or vice versa.[10]

SHIM. As a railroad term see Railroads § 1 r.

SHINGLE. In the works of modern lexicographers,[11] the word "shingle" is defined as meaning an oblong piece of wood, thinner at one end than at the other, used instead of slates or tiles for covering roofs;[12] a piece of wood sawed or rived thin and small, with one end thinner than the other, for covering roofs, etc., the thick ends of one row overlapping the thin ends of the next;[13] a thin piece of wood, having parallel sides and being thicker at one end than the other, used like a tile or a slate in covering the sides and roofs of houses;[14] a thin piece of wood, usually eighteen inches long and four or more wide, half an inch thick at one end, and tapering to less than an eighth of an inch at the other end, used like a tile or slate in covering roofs and sometimes the sides of buildings, the thick ends of one course lapping over the thin ends of the rows next below;[15] a wooden tile.[16] The word is said to import a manufacture of wood;[17] and hence not to be a generic term so as to include any article which could be used as a roof covering and which might arbitrarily be called a certain kind of shingle.[18]

SHINGLES. A term medically defined as "Herpes Zoster."[19]

SHINNEY or SHINNY. In certain localities another name for home-made intoxicating whisky as stated in Intoxicating Liquors § 13. Judicial notice of the meaning of the term see Criminal Law §§ 535, 537.

SHINPLASTERS. Certain bills and notes, so called because they were for a small sum of money; also commonly denominated "change tickets."[20]

SHIP.

As a noun. The noun "ship" is defined generally in Collision § 2 a.

As a verb. The primary idea of the verb "to ship"[21] is to put for transport aboard a vessel;[22] to place on board a ship or vessel for transportation,[23] and, advancing on this, it has come to express the idea of to convey by ship or water;[24] to send by water.[25] However, the word is not confined to transportation in a vessel, or to transportation by water, but may have reference to any conveyance,[26] or to transportation by land, water, or both,[27] since common usage has long sanctioned its use in connection with shipment by rail, by air, or by truck.[28]

Finally it has come to mean, ac-

Thus the ordinary meaning of the term is to load for transportation;[29] to put on board the vehicle which is to transport;[30] to commit to any conveyance for transportation;[31] to deliver for shipment.[32]

The word "ship" is commonly used to signify the act of delivering to a carrier for shipment,[33] and ordinarily means to deliver to a carrier for transportation;[34] to deliver to a common carrier, forwarder, express company, etc., for tranportation, whether by land or water or both.[35] It generally expresses the idea of goods delivered to carriers for the purpose of being transported from one place to another,[36] and this signification is given the term by lexicographers generally,[37] and the adjudicated cases are in general accord on the question.[38]

It has been said that the word "ship" is susceptible of meaning to carry or transport, but that is neither its primary nor ordinary meaning.[39]

The term "ship" is sometimes defined to mean to send away; to get rid of;[40] and it may be employed in the sense of to receive and carry.[41]

"Ship" has been held equivalent to, or synonymous with, "bill" see 10 C.J.S. p 386 note 20, "carry" see 13 C.J.S. p 1763 note 14, "convey" see 18 C.J.S. p 87 note 40, and "transport."[42]

Shipped. Although the verb "shipped" is derived from the noun "ship," its connotation is not necessarily limited to transportation by water,[43] and the word is frequently used to express the idea of goods delivered to carriers for the purpose of being transported from one place to another, over land as well as over water.[44]

The word "shipped" is defined as meaning put on board;[45] and in common maritime and mercantile usage, it means placed on board of a vessel, for the purchaser or consignee, to be transported at his risk.[46] It has been said that the word "shipped," according to its natural and ordinary meaning and signification,[47] as well as its meaning in the mercantile community,[48] has reference to the putting of goods on board a vessel and taking a bill of lading therefor;[49] and, with reference to transportation by land, it implies a completed act, irrespective of the time or mode of transportation.[50] The term implies a past fact, in the sense of "placed," "separated," or "set apart,"[51] but it is sometimes defined as meaning to load for transportation.[52]

Shipping. The present participle and verbal noun of "ship."[53]

The word "shipping" is defined in a nautical sense as meaning ships of all kinds, or of some particular kind, collectively; the body of vessels belonging to a country or port; also, tonnage.[54] In this connection see the title Shipping which treats the building, regulation, ownership, and employment of vessels of every kind; rights of property therein; rights, duties, and liabilities of owners, mortgagees, charterers, and masters of vessels in general; and rights and liabilities of shippers and consignees of goods and of passengers, so far as they are peculiar to transportation by water.

As used in commerce, the word "shipping" means the act or business of delivering to a common carrier for tranportation, or of forwarding;[55] and the term, as used among shippers and wharfingers, means putting the cargo into a vessel, either with or without the intervention of the wharf.[56]

"Shipping" has been distinguished from "landing" see 51 C.J.S. p 487 note 88.

Phrases employing various forms of the term are set out in the note.[57]

SHIPBUILDING. Naval architecture or construction; the art of constructing ships and other vessels.[58]

SHIPMASTER. The captain or master of a merchant ship, appointed and put in command by the owner, and having general control of the vessel and cargo, with power to bind the owner by his lawful acts and engagements in the management of the ship.[59]

SHIPMENT. Although the word "shipment" is said to have a well-established,[60] well-understood ordinary,[61] meaning, and a uniform signification,[62] the term, in fact, is used to indicate property which is the subject of transportation as well as the transportation itself,[63] and it is treated in these two senses in the following paragraphs.

The word "shipment" is generally used to express the idea of goods delivered to carriers for the purpose of being transported from one place to another,[64] over land as well as water,[65] and it has been said that such signification is given the word by lexicographers generally[66] as well as by law dictionaries,[67] and that the adjudicated cases are in general accord on the question.[68]

"Shipment" is defined as meaning the act or process of shipping;[69] the act of dispatching or shipping;[70] the act or process of dispatching goods by vessel or other means of transportation;[71] the act of shipping anything,[72] the act or process of having goods transported to a designated place;[73] the act of dispatching or delivery on board of a carrier.[74]

In terms of "delivery," the word "shipment" is defined as meaning delivery of goods to a carrier for transportation;[75] delivery of goods to a forwarding agent for conveyance by means of an established channel of transportation;[76] delivery on board.[77]

Although the word "shipment" is applicable especially to the putting of goods or passengers on board ship for transportation by water,[78] and is sometimes defined as meaning loaded on board ship,[79] the act of shipping or putting on board a ship,[80] the act of putting anything on board of a ship or other vessel,[81] the same signification is given the term by lexicographers when applied to transportation either by land or by water.[82]

"Shipment" also means to take on,[83] and this is said to be the ordinary meaning when used in connection with transportation by vessel[84]

It has been said supra p 560 note 63 that the word "shipment" may be used to include the property which is the subject of transportation, as well as the transportation itself, and in terms of property which is the subject of transportation the word "shipment" is defined as meaning that which is shipped,[85] as a shipment of cattle;[86] a consignment;[87] a consignment of goods delivered for transportation,[88] a consignment as delivered by a railroad company;[89] a quantity of goods delivered at one time for transportation, whether by sea or by land.[90]

The statement has been frequently made that, with respect to carriage by land, the word "shipment" implies a completed act, irrespective of the time or mode of transportation.[91] Other statements to the same effect, but without being restricted to carriage by land, have been made, and thus it has been said that loading, alone, is not shipment.[92] Shipment consists in the complete delivery of goods by the shipper to a carrier for transportation,[93] and the shipment is not made until the shipper has parted with all control over the goods and nothing remains to be done by him to complete the delivery,[94] and the term means that the goods have been delivered to the carrier and his bill of lading issued therefor.[95] However, the word "shipment" does include the whole movement of the goods,[96] and does not refer to the departure of the vehicle of transportation[97] or the clearance of the vessel,[98] and it does not mean that the goods are to be transported by a certain day.[99]

"Shipment" has been held synonymous with "order" see 67 C.J.S. p 520 note 64, and it has been distinguished from "delivery" see 26 C J.S. p 697 note 59.2, and "transportation."[1]

I. NATIONALITY OF VESSEL AND REGULATION

§ 1. National Character of Vessel

In general the ownership of a vessel determines its national character, and the sale of an American vessel to an alien results in a loss or divestiture of nationality.

In general the ownership of a vessel determines its national character.[1] The fact that a vessel is not a "vessel of the United States" within the meaning of the registry and enrollment laws does not prevent her being an American vessel where her owner is a citizen of the United States,[2] and the nationality of a vessel not duly registered is that of her owner.[3]

Loss of nationality. A sale of an American vessel to a citizen of the United States does not result in a loss or divestiture of nationality.[4] On the other hand, a sale of a vessel to an alien results in a loss or divestiture of nationality,[5] as, for example, a sale in a foreign jurisdiction under admiralty process.[6]

Evidence. While it has been laid down in general terms that the documents a vessel carries furnish the only evidence of nationality,[7] it has been held that the ownership of a vessel, as determining her nationality, may be proved in the same manner as that of any other chattel.[8] A certificate of registry under the laws of the United States and proof that the vessel carries the American flag are prima facie sufficient to establish her nationality, without direct proof of the citizenship of her owners;[9] but the register of a vessel, while proper evidence of nationality, is not necessarily indispensable, and the flag and ownership of the vessel may be proved by parol or by any other competent evidence.[10] It has been stated as a general rule that the flag under which a merchant ship sails is prima facie proof of her nationality.[11]

The national character of a vessel, as determined by ownership, is presumed to continue until a change is shown to have occurred,[12] and the burden of proving a change is on the party who relies on such change.[13] In order to show loss of nationality of an American vessel by a sale abroad it must appear that she was sold to a foreigner.[14]

§ 2. Regulation in General

A sovereign has power to regulate the vessels under its flag on the high seas, and accordingly congress has the power to regulate the conduct of domestic merchant ships when on the high seas, or to exert such control over them when in foreign waters as may be affirmatively or tacitly permitted by the territorial sovereign. A vessel subject to regulation includes every description of watercraft or other artificial contrivance used or capable of being used, as a means of transportation on water.

The power of a sovereign to regulate the vessels under its flag on the high seas[15] and the conduct of its citizens while on such vessels[16] has been asserted. However, a private ship is subject to the laws of the country visited, in the absence of treaties to the contrary,[17] and the jurisdiction of a country over a ship flying its flag partakes more of the characteristics of personal than of territorial sovereignty, and has little application in foreign territorial waters beyond what is affirmatively or tacitly permitted by the local sovereign.[18] In accordance with the foregoing rules, congress has the power to regulate the conduct of domestic merchant ships when on the high seas, or to exert such control over them when in foreign waters as may be affirmatively or tacitly permitted by the territorial sovereign,[19] and congress also has power to regulate matters affecting foreign vessels when within the ports of the United States, by making their entrance subject to such conditions as it may impose, or wholly withdrawing its consent to permit them to enter.[20] The operation of vessels in intra-state commerce may be subject to state regulation.[21]

The subject of shipping is largely regulated by the Shipping Act of 1916, and amendments thereto, 46 U S C A. § 801 et seq, which is a comprehensive measure bearing a relation to common carriers by water substantially the same as that borne by the Interstate Commerce Act to interstate common carriers by land,[22] and in view of the fact that the

Competing operators for through traffic

Certificate permitting steamboat service between stated points, contemplating calls at intermediate points, empowered carrier to carry through traffic, hence operators of steamboat service partly over same route were "competing" operators for through traffic within state public service law, even though one made intermediate calls—State v. Department of Public Works, supra.

Determination of controversy between operators

On petition of certificate holder for permission to improve steamboat service and protest of competing carrier, state department could determine controversy as though protest were complaint.—State v. Department of Public Works, supra.

22. U S—Inter-Island Steam Nav. Co. v. Territory of Hawaii by Pub-

Shipping Act so closely parallels the Interstate Commerce Act in general scope and purpose, and as well as in terms, it manifests an intent that the two acts, each in its own field, should have a like interpretation, application, and effect.[23] A statute providing that a towboat operator operating as a common carrier may not at the same time rent barges indiscriminately except when specially permitted is not invalid.[24] A statute of Hawaii providing for the investigation of public utilities, including water carriers, and for the collection of fees to meet the cost of investigations is valid as to intra-state commerce within the territory of Hawaii.[25]

Federal regulation of motor boats relating to the equipment of such boats and the manner of their operation does not constitute an assertion of exclusive federal jurisdiction with respect to such boats so as to preclude control by the state courts of the use of such boats for picketing in a labor dispute.[26] Under some statutes, with some exceptions, only domestic-built and documented vessels are entitled to participate in coastwise trade, and foreign vessels are excluded therefrom;[27] and vessels are not "owned by persons who are citizens" so as to permit coastwise trade notwithstanding ownership is in a domestic corporation, where a proportion of stock in excess of that specified in the statute is owned or controlled by aliens.[28] Vessels are subject to the scrutiny of the Coast Guard and customs officials within the jurisdiction, without probable cause or search warrant, for any violation of the navigation or other laws.[29]

Vessels subject to regulation. Within the scope of regulations concerning shipping generally, the word "vessel" is defined by federal statute, 1 U.S. C.A. § 3, as including every description of watercraft or other artificial contrivance used or capable of being used, as a means of transportation on water.[30] Generally speaking, "barge" is a word of somewhat comprehensive signification and may

Validity

Statute prohibiting foreign owned or controlled vessels from engaging in domestic coastwise traffic has been held not violative of federal Constitution as to Canadian controlled steamship line operating on through route recognized by Interstate Commerce Commission, though statute compelled discontinuance of part of line's business—Central Vermont Transp Co v Durning, N Y, 55 S Ct 306, 294 U S 33, 79 L Ed 741

Route established by Interstate Commerce Commission

Statute authorizing Interstate Commerce Commission to establish through routes for rail and water lines did not render statutory prohibition against foreign vessels engaging in coastwise trade inapplicable to vessels operated as part of through route recognized by commission—Central Vermont Transp Co v Durning, N Y, 55 S Ct. 306, 294 U S 33, 79 L Ed 741.

"Between points in the United States"

Under provisions in substance prohibiting the transportation of merchandise, by water, "between points in the United States" in vessels other than vessels built in and documented under laws of the United States and owned by United States citizens, the quoted words refer to definite, fixed, and permanent physical places, points, or locations, and were not intended to include such constantly changing and figurative points or places as United States ships on the high seas and in the territorial waters of other nations—U S v 12536 Gross Tons of Whale Oil Ex The Charles Racine, D C Va, 29 F Supp 262.

Transportation of passengers

The statute prohibiting foreign vessels from transporting passengers between ports in the United States, either directly or by way of a foreign port, under a penalty of a fixed sum of money for each passenger transported, is designed to exclude ships of foreign registry from carrying on coastwise or other domestic traffic by direct or indirect carriage of passengers from one United States port to another—The Granada, D.C. Pa, 35 F Supp. 892.

§ 3. Registry, Enrollment, and License

a. In general
b. Port of registry or enrollment
c. Nature, necessity, purpose, requisites, and effect
d. Reciprocal exchanges

a. In General

The federal statutes providing a system of registry and enrollment of vessels have distinguished between vessels engaged in foreign trade and those engaged in the coasting trade and fisheries and employ the words "register" or "registry" with reference to vessels in the first class and "enroll" or "enrollment" with reference to vessels in the other class.

The federal statutes providing a system of registry and enrollment of vessels have distinguished between vessels engaged in foreign trade and those engaged in the coasting trade and fisheries and employ the words "register" or "registry" with reference to vessels in the first class and "enroll" or "enrollment" with reference to vessels in the other class.[36] It has been broadly held that every vessel of the United States must have a register or an enrollment, the former for foreign trade and the latter for domestic commerce, and without them or without the right one with respect to the trade she is engaged in, or the place where she is found, the vessel is entitled to no protection under the laws of the United States, and is liable to seizure for such violation of law.[37]

"Vessel of the United States." The phrase "vessel of the United States" is made, by the legislation of congress, a legal technical term,[38] and the requirements as to registration, enrollment, or license, a compliance with which entitles a vessel to that designation, have expressly been laid down.[39] By a compliance with such requisites a vessel becomes a "vessel of the United States,"[40] with the resultant privileges and right to protection to which a "vessel of the United States" is entitled,[41] otherwise not.[42] "A vessel of the United States," as defined in the statute, means more than a vessel whose nationality is American.[43]

Liability of officers in respect of registry or enrollment. A collector who wrongfully refuses to re-register a vessel after a sale is not personally liable in damages when his refusal is based on an honest mistake in the construction of the law.[44] After an exchange of a register for an enrollment, in no event has the collector the right to keep both the register and enrollment, and if he does so he is liable for the resulting damage.[45]

b. Port of Registry or Enrollment

Under the federal statutes vessels are required to be registered or enrolled in the collection district which comprehends the port to which they belong.

31. Particular craft
Word "barge" may cover pleasure boats or boats of state, used by officers or magistrates, and a flat-bottomed vessel of burden for loading and unloading of ships.—The Sakito Maru, D.C.Cal., 41 F.Supp. 769, affirmed in part and reversed in part on other grounds, C.C.A., Carr v. 45. U.S.—Badger v. Gutierez, La., 4 S.Ct. 563, 111 U.S. 734, 28 L.Ed. 581.

Under the federal statutes vessels are required to be registered or enrolled in the collection district which comprehends the port to which they belong, which port is deemed to be that at or nearest to which the owner, if there be but one, or, if more than one, the husband or acting and managing owner of such vessel, usually resides.[46] The term "home port" has been defined as any place or port where the owner happens to be with his vessel,[47] the port at or nearest to which the owner of a vessel, if there is but one, or, if more than one, the managing owner usually resides;[48] the port where the vessel is enrolled[49]

Vessel owned by corporation While there is authority for the view that a corporation may enroll a vessel in a state other than that of its incorporation, where it does business with the vessel in such other state and has an office there,[50] the federal courts have held that, for purposes of registration, the corporation is deemed to reside in the state in which it is incorporated.[51]

Registration in district other than that to which vessel belongs. Provision has been made for registration by the collector of the port where at the time the registry is effected the vessel may be.[52] If, however, a vessel is registered at a port other than that to which she belongs, and she afterward arrives at her home port, she is to be there registered anew, and her former certificate given up.[53] In this connection registers have been classified as either permanent[54] or temporary;[55] but a vessel cannot have more than one register at the same time, the "temporary," being superseded by the "permanent," register.[56]

Evidence. While the port of registry or enrollment is prima facie the home port of a vessel,[57] according to some cases the presumption so arising must be overcome by clear proof before any other port is taken as the home port.[58] This presumption is not, however, conclusive in all cases.[59]

(a) In General

Registry of a vessel is in the nature of a continuing license entitling the vessel to the protection of the laws of the United States to which a duly registered vessel is entitled while she is engaged in a trade for which registry is required; but registration is not compulsory, it being a privilege and advantage of which the owners may or may not avail themselves as they choose.

Registry under the federal statutes is in the nature of a continuing license,[60] and secures to the owners of the registered vessel the privilege involved as long as the registry continues in force, and no longer.[61] It has been stated in general terms that the registry continues in force only as long as the legal status of the vessel remains unchanged,[62] and that the protection afforded by the registry is lost where the vessel engages in a trade which contravenes the laws of the United States.[63] The registration of vessels is not compulsory, it being a privilege and advantage of which the owners may or may not avail themselves as they choose;[64] but a vessel which is not registered is not entitled to the protection of the laws of the United States, to which a duly registered vessel is entitled while she is engaged in a trade for which registry is required.[65]

The registration of a vessel is presumed to meet the requirements of law under which it was granted.[66]

Approval of shipping board to surrender of registry. The statutory provision that any vessel registered under the laws of the United States shall be deemed to continue to be documented under the laws of the United States within the meaning of the statute requiring the approval of the shipping board of the sale, when the United States is at war or during any national emergency, of any vessel documented under the laws of the United States, until such registry is surrendered with the approval of the board, applies only to vessels engaged in commerce or for pleasure,[67] and does not apply to a vessel owned by the United States for the naval service.[68]

Purpose. Among the purposes of the registry laws of the United States and of registration thereunder are: To encourage American enterprise,[69] to give certain advantages to the vessels which are entitled to registry;[70] to declare the nationality of a vessel engaged in trade with foreign nations;[71] to enable such vessel to assert her nationality wherever found;[72] to protect the public revenue against fraud;[73] and to facilitate the collection of certain public dues.[74]

(b) What Vessels To Be Registered, and Persons Entitled to Register

Generally, such vessels only as are within the specific provisions of the federal statute as to registration are entitled to be registered, and under such statutes only citizens of the United States may register their vessels.

Generally, such vessels only as are within the specific provisions of the federal statute as to registration are entitled to be registered.[75] The policy of the law is to assure that at all times vessels shall be registered in the names of their owners.[76] Only citizens of the United States are entitled to have their vessels registered.[77] A domestic corporation has been recognized as a citizen of the United States and, as such, entitled to register a vessel owned by it,[78] notwithstanding some of the corporate stock belongs, directly or indirectly, to aliens.[79] The statutory provisions for the issuance of a register of a vessel owned by a corporation in the name of the president or secretary are permissive and not mandatory.[80]

Wrecked vessel. A vessel wrecked at sea and then brought into the United States is not entitled to an American registry under the statute providing for such registry in the case of vessels wrecked in the United States under certain circumstances where the cost of the repairs equal a certain amount relative to the value of the vessel.[81]

Vessels in military and naval service. By virtue of statute it has been laid down that all vessels in the military or naval service of the United States are exempt from registry.[82]

(c) Procedure

In order to entitle a vessel to registry her owner must, pursuant to federal statute, make application under oath, setting forth certain matters involving a description of the vessel and the right to have her registered.

registered;[84] and a vessel may not be registered until proof of the citizenship of all her owners is placed on record.[85] It is not necessary, however, that there should be a disclosure of an equitable title unless such title is in the subject of a foreign state.[86] The registry statute was construed in an early case as requiring, in all cases, a specific declaration that no subject of a foreign state was interested directly or indirectly, by way of trust or confidence or otherwise, in the vessel or her profits,[87] but the interest referred to is interest by way of ownership,[88] and does not include the interest of a stockholder of a corporation which owns the vessel in question,[89] and it has been held that the statute does not, in the case of registration by a corporation, require an oath that there is no foreign interest in the vessel.[90] Where a registry is obtained by a false oath as to the citizenship of the owner, as against the United States, the vessel cannot be deemed a vessel of the United States,[91] and she is not entitled to the benefits or privileges appertaining to such vessels.[92]

(d) Effect of Sale or Other Transfer of Vessel

Sale to an alien of a "vessel of the United States" renders her registry inoperative, and terminates the privilege of registry under the laws of the country of her former nationality. The sale of a registered vessel to a citizen of the United States likewise renders the registry inoperative and void, but in such case the vessel may be registered anew on proof that the new owner is a citizen of the United States.

In the case of a "vessel of the United States," a sale to an alien divests her nationality, as discussed supra § 1, renders her registry inoperative,[93] and terminates the privilege of registry under the laws of the country of her former nationality[94] and also her privileges as a "vessel of the United States."[95] However, the right of an American citizen to register a vessel bought by him from an alien who had himself bought such vessel from an American citizen at a time when such vessel was registered under the registration laws of the United States has been upheld.[96] A sale of a vessel registered under the laws of the United States to a citizen of the United States renders the registry inoperative and void,[97] but such sale does not denationalize her, as discussed supra § 1; and under the statute she may be registered anew[98] on proof that the new owner is a citizen of the United States.[99]

The statutory provision that, if there is a failure to register anew a vessel sold or transferred to a citizen of the United States, she ceases to be a vessel of the United States has been given effect under various circumstances.[1] The necessity for compliance with the statutory requirement that, in order to permit registry anew after sale or other transfer to a citizen of the United States, the sale or transfer shall be made by an instrument in writing in the nature of a bill of sale, which shall recite at length the certificate of registry, has been asserted or recognized.[2] A failure to comply with such requirement prevents the enjoyment of privileges to which a "vessel of the United States" is entitled,[3] and, in so far as such privileges are concerned, has the effect of having the vessel regarded as an alien or a foreign vessel,[4] but does not render the sale illegal and void, as discussed infra § 20. The transfer of a vessel owned by a corporation of a neutral power to the American flag after beginning of war has been held not a violation of international law or American neutrality, although made to conceal ownership of the transferor corporation's stock by a citizen of one of the belligerent powers.[5]

(e) Deposit of Register with Consul

The statutory requirement that masters on arriving at a foreign port shall deposit their registers with the consul or vice consul, if any, at that port, refers ordinarily, at least, to an arrival for purposes of business, that is, one requiring an entry and clearance and stay at the port sufficiently long to require some of the acts connected with business.

The statutory requirement that masters on arriving at a foreign port shall deposit their registers with the consul or vice consul, if any, at that port, for a noncompliance with which a penalty has been provided, has been construed as referring ordinarily, at least, to an arrival for purposes of business, that is, one requiring an entry and clearance and stay at the port sufficiently long to require some of the acts connected with business,[6] and not to include touching at a port to obtain information,[7] or to ascertain the state of the market,[8] or because of the stress of weather.[9] However, there is authority for the view that if a vessel makes an entry, or is required by law or usage to make an entry, on coming to port, there is an "arrival" within the meaning of the statute.[10] There must, of course, be a consular officer at the port of arrival in order to render the statute applicable.[11] The statutory requirement includes every foreign port where the designated officer is present.[12]

(2) Enrollment, License, and Number

(a) In general
(b) Meaning and effect of license
(c) What vessels may be enrolled, and persons entitled to enroll
(d) Procedure
(e) Effect of sale

(a) In General

Enrollment is the recording and certification of a vessel employed in coastwise or inland navigation, and in order to be entitled thereto the vessel must possess the same qualifications, and the same requirements in all respects must be complied with, as are required before registering a vessel. A vessel which is not enrolled is not entitled to the protection of the laws of the United States, to which a duly enrolled vessel is entitled while engaged in a trade for which enrollment is required.

The term "enrollment of vessels" signifies, in the laws of the United States on the subject of merchant shipping, the recording and certification of vessels employed in coastwise or inland navigation,[13] as distinguished from the "registration" of vessels employed in foreign commerce.[14] Under the provision of the statute, in order to entitle a vessel to enrollment she must possess the same qualifications, and the same requirements in all respects must be complied with, as are required before registering a vessel.[15] While in general the purpose of an enrollment is to evidence the national character of a vessel engaged in the coasting trade or home traffic and to enable such vessel to procure a coasting license,[16] a statute permits a vessel navigating the waters on the northern, northeastern, or northwestern frontiers to engage both in domestic and foreign commerce under an enrollment and license.[17] A vessel not registered, enrolled, or licensed, but which has only a number allotted pursuant to statute, is not authorized to be employed in trade, foreign or coasting.[18] Enrollment does not affect title but confers the character and privileges of an American vessel.[19] On an incidental question not affecting the title of the parties, an enrollment is competent evidence,[20] and is conclusive as to the character of the vessel, whether foreign or domestic, unless contradicted by clear evidence of the notorious residence of the owner at a place or port other than that named in the enrollment.[21]

Necessity. A vessel which is not enrolled is not entitled to the protection of the laws of the United States, to which a duly enrolled vessel is entitled while engaged in a trade for which enrollment is required.[22] The acts of congress providing for the enrollment and license of vessels do not apply to vessels employed on the interior waters of the country unless such waters are public navigable waters of the United States.[23]

What constitutes coasting trade. A vessel engaged in navigation between two states over interior waters has been regarded as engaged in the coasting trade,[24] but a different rule has been recognized in respect of ferrying across a river at a point wholly within the limits of a state.[25] It seems that, although a vessel navigates only from port to port in the same state, if her employment constitutes a link in a chain of commerce among the states she will be regarded as being in the coasting trade.[26] The coasting trade includes trade between Puerto Rico and the United States.[27]

(b) Meaning and Effect of License

Generally, the purpose of a license is not to confer the status of a vessel of the United States, but to give permission to such vessel to carry on the contemplated trade.

In respect of a vessel of twenty tons and upward which is enrolled, the purpose of a license is not to confer the status of a vessel of the United States,[28] but is to give permission to such vessel to carry on the contemplated trade,[29] that is, the coasting trade.[30] A license to prosecute the coasting trade is a warrant to traverse the waters washing or bounding the coasts of the United States,[31] and gives no privilege to use, free of tolls, or of any condition whatsoever, the canals constructed by a state,[32] or the watercourses partaking of the character of canals exclusively within the interior of a state, and made practicable for navigation by the funds of the state or by privileges she may have conferred for the accomplishment of the same end;[33] but it does permit navigation, between states, of a public navigable water.[34] Certain officers are authorized by statute to board and inspect a vessel in order to inspect her license, and such power extends to a search of the vessel to ascertain whether she was engaged in activity outside the scope of the license.[35]

(c) What Vessels May Be Enrolled, and Persons Entitled to Enroll

No vessel is a vessel of the United States for purposes of enrollment unless she belongs to a citizen of the United States. A domestic corporation is entitled to enroll a vessel owned by it, notwithstanding some of the corporate stock belongs to aliens.

It is generally the policy of the law that no vessel is a vessel of the United States for purposes of enrollment unless she belongs to a citizen of the United States.[36] A statute authorizing foreign-built vessels admitted to American registry and owned on a certain date by United States citizens to engage in the coastwise trade, as long as they continue in such ownership, is required to be interpreted in the light of national policy limiting coastwise trade to American-built and owned vessels,[37] and, accordingly, foreign-built vessels which on the specified date were of American registry and owned by United States citizens, but which for a period subsequent thereto had not been owned by United States citizens, although they were so owned at the time of attempted enrollment, are not entitled, under the statute, to certificates of enrollment for the coastwise trade.[38]

A domestic corporation has been recognized as entitled to enroll a vessel owned by it,[39] notwithstanding some of the corporate stock belongs to aliens;[40] but under a specific provision of law a majority of the stock of the corporation must be owned by citizens of the United States in order to permit the vessel to be enrolled or licensed.[41] The statutory provision for the issuance of enrollment and license of a vessel owned by a corporation in the name of the president or secretary is permissive, and not mandatory.[42]

Prior to the independence of the Philippine Islands, provision was made for the issuance of certificates for coasting trade to citizens of the United States resident in the Islands, to natives on taking the oath of allegiance, or to Spanish subjects who took the oath of abjuration and of allegiance to the United States.[43]

A canal boat is not a ship or vessel within the meaning of statutes here under consideration.[44]

(d) Procedure

In order to obtain the enrollment of a vessel, it is necessary to comply with the same requirements in all respects as are necessary before registering a vessel.

Under the statute, it is necessary, in order to obtain the enrollment of a vessel, to comply with the same requirements in all respects as are necessary before registering a vessel.[45] Accordingly, an oath[46] setting forth certain particulars, such as the age, measurement, tonnage, etc, of the vessel, and the names and place of abode of the owner,[47] must be executed by the owner of the vessel,[48] and a failure to comply with the requirement as to execution by the owner renders an attempted enrollment ineffective.[49] The statute was construed in an early case as requiring, in all cases, a specific declaration that no subject of a foreign state was interested directly or indirectly, by way of trust or confidence or otherwise, in the vessel or her profits,[50] but the interest referred to is an interest by way of ownership,[51] and does not include the interest of a stockholder of a corporation which owns the vessel in question.[52] The effective date of the license of a vessel is the date of application for the license and not the date of the clerical act of issuing the license.[53]

(e) Effect of Sale

Where a vessel enrolled as a vessel of the United States is sold to a citizen, it ceases to be a "vessel of the United States" unless it is registered, enrolled, or licensed anew.

According to some cases, where a vessel enrolled as a vessel of the United States is sold to a citizen, it ceases to be a "vessel of the United States" unless it is registered, enrolled, or licensed anew,[54] and an enrolled vessel transferred by an instrument which does not contain a recital of the certificate of enrollment is not entitled to a new enrollment.[55] The view has been expressed, however, that an enrolled vessel sold to a citizen of the United States does not cease to be a "vessel of the United States" because of the lack of a new registry or enrollment.[56] The provision of the statute requiring a vessel on sale to a citizen to be registered anew "by her former name" has been regarded as not controlling in the case of an enrolled and licensed vessel rather than a registered one.[57]

d. Reciprocal Exchanges

Registry may be exchanged for enrollment, and vice versa, but compliance must be had with the statutory provisions relating thereto.

Hudson River Day Line, supra.

Under the statute, collectors of the several districts are authorized to enroll and license any ship or vessel that may be registered, on such registry being given up, or to register any ship or vessel that may be enrolled, on the enrollment and license being given up as required.[58] Where the vessel is in a district other than that to which she belongs, the application for the exchange may be made by the master, but compliance must be had with the statutory provision for an oath by him that, according to his best knowledge and belief, the property remains as expressed in the register or enrollment.[59] Under a provision that the register or enrollment granted in lieu of the one given up shall within ten days after the arrival of the ship or vessel within the district to which she belongs be delivered to the collector of such district, and be canceled by him, the term "arrival" means an arrival with the intention to return to the home port as the terminus or one of the termini of the voyage and in the course of prosecuting the voyage,[60] and does not include a mere touching or staying at such port for accidental and transitory purposes, having no connection with the original enterprise.[61]

Improper issuance. Where an enrollment has improperly been issued in exchange for a register, the owner is entitled either to obtain a proper enrollment or to the return of his register.[62]

§ 4. Taxes, Duties, Dues, and Port Charges

a. In general
b. Subject matter of tax or duty; vessels included
c. Enforcement; remedies of taxpayer

a. In General

In accordance with provisions of federal statutes, a tonnage tax and a duty denominated "light money" are imposed on certain vessels. Pleasure boats and boat and packet lines used as public utilities may be subject to a license fee or tax imposed by the state.

In accordance with provisions of federal statutes, a tonnage tax is imposed on certain vessels,[63] and a duty of a specified amount per ton, denominated "light money," is levied and collected, in the same manner and under the same regulations as tonnage duties, on all vessels not of the United States, which may enter the ports of the United States.[64] In general a tonnage tax or duty is a tax on entry.[65]

A statute, no longer in effect, providing for the levy and collection annually on the first day of September of a sum equivalent to a tonnage tax of a specific amount per ton on the use of every foreign-built yacht, pleasure boat, or vessel, not used or intended to be used for trade, now or hereafter owned or chartered for more than six months by any citizen or citizens of the United States, was held to impose an excise tax,[66] and its validity was upheld.[67]

Pleasure boats may be subject to a state license fee,[68] and boat and packet lines may be subject to a license tax on public utilities extending to such lines.[69]

Under the Organic Act applicable to Hawaii, the board of harbor commissioners may impose tolls and tonnage charges on freight passing over territorial wharves,[70] and under a Hawaiian statute, not superseded by the Shipping Act of 1916, 46 U.S.C.A. § 801 et seq, the territorial public utilities commisson has power to collect taxes from water carriers to pay the costs of investigation of such carriers.[71]

Computation and amount. Tax or duty may be exacted only at the rate per ton set forth in the statute[72] or provided for by treaty.[73]

b. Subject Matter of Tax or Duty; Vessels Included

Statutes imposing tonnage duties generally are applicable only to a "vessel" entering a port, and, in the case of certain specified duties, to a "vessel not of the United States" when it arrives from a foreign port or place.

Statutes imposing tonnage duties generally apply only to a "vessel" entering a port of the United States.[74] A "vessel not of the United States" on which, under certain circumstances, a tonnage duty or tax is imposed by statute[75] includes a vessel owned by citizens which is not entitled to registry or enrollment so as to obtain the status of "a vessel of the United States,"[76] and such vessel is subject to the tax or duty when it arrives from a foreign port or place,[77] but prior to the independence of the Philippine Islands it was held that such vessel was not liable for the tonnage duty where it entered from the port of Manila, P. I.[78] A vessel "enters" the United States from that foreign port from which she last cleared within the contemplation of a provision of the statute imposing duties at a certain rate on vessels "entering" from ports in certain areas and a different rate on vessels entering from all other foreign ports;[79] and this rule applies regardless of whether the vessel enters a port in the United States in ballast or with freight loaded at the second foreign port.[80] Where, however, a vessel incidentally stops at a foreign intermediate port to secure ship supplies, the vessel has not "entered" such port, and such port cannot be considered in determining the tonnage tax applicable to the vessel on its entry into a port in the United States.[81]

The provision of the statute imposing a tonnage duty on any vessel not of the United States, which shall be entered in one district from another, having, on board, goods, wares, or merchandise taken in one district to be delivered in another, does not authorize the enaction of a tonnage tax on a foreign vessel which goes from one district to another with cargo brought from a foreign port, where there has not been an actual physical removal of cargo from or to the vessel.[82] Under an early statute it was held that a vessel which was forced to go into port in distress, because of bad weather, was not liable for tonnage or light duties.[83] Statutory provision has been made for the preservation of rights acquired under treaties, in respect of the tonnage or light duties.[84]

Where collector arbitrarily determined the foreign port from which vessel entered United States as Talara, Peru, and refused to accept master's oath on form which showed vessel as arriving from Vancouver, Canada, government could not rely on master's subsequent oath of entry of vessel from foreign port as disclosing entry from Talara, Peru, for purpose of determining rate of tonnage tax—Union Oil Co. of California v. Vessels of Prussia

(1) Statutes providing that no higher rate of duties should be im-

A statute imposing an annual license tax or fee, based on the tonnage of vessels involved, in respect of certain freight and transportation lines, propelled by mechanical power, has been construed as applying to barges [85] The statute has been held not to exempt from the payment of the license fee, in respect of a vessel operating between Alaska and Canada, although such vessel was compelled to pay a tax in Canada.[86]

Under a statute no longer in effect imposing a tax or duties in respect of foreign-built vessels not used or intended to be used for trade, which were owned or chartered by citizens of the United States, the "use" which was taxed was not the mere potential use, or privilege of use, which the owner enjoyed, but was the actual exercise of the right to use, which ownership conferred.[87]

Exemption from payment of duties or tax. In accordance with statutory provisions, vessels of a foreign nation may be exempted from tonnage and impost duties on a showing satisfactory to the president that no discriminating duties are imposed by such foreign nation against domestic vessels [88] A statutory provision exempting from tonnage dues "a vessel belonging to or employed in the service of the government of the United States" does not relieve a vessel from the payment of such dues merely because such vessel carries cargo for the United States, where such vessel is not under the control of the United States.[89] The statute requiring the payment of light money does not apply to an unregistered vessel of the United States, carrying a sea letter or other regular document issued from a customhouse of the United States proving that the vessel is American property.[90] Under a provision exempting vessels navigating otherwise than by sea from payment of clearance and entrance fees, the term "sea" is not restricted to open sea or ocean so as to exempt from such fees a vessel plying waters which are partially landlocked.[91]

c. Enforcement; Remedies of Taxpayer

The collector may refuse to enter as well as to clear a vessel which has not paid her tonnage or light duties, but if he fails to do so the United States may maintain an action for the duties. A person from whom tonnage or light duties have wrongfully been exacted may recover back by action, from the collector of customs, the amount so wrongfully exacted.

The collector may refuse to enter as well as to clear a vessel which has not paid her tonnage or light duties.[92] If he fails to do so the United States has an action for the duties against the owner,[93] and, it has been intimated, against the master,[94] and also against the ship,[95] but not against a mere consignee of the vessel, for he has no interest or special property in the vessel.[96]

The tax for the use of foreign-built vessels, not used or intended to be used for trade, based on tonnage, imposed by a statute, now repealed, was collectable by an action in personam against the owner.[97]

§ 5. Inspection, Equipment, Personnel, and Rules of Inspectors

a. In general
b. Vessels or equipment included

a. In General

Congress has by various enactments created a comprehensive scheme for the inspection of vessels. Compliance must be had with such provisions and with provisions pertaining to personnel of vessels.

Congress has by various enactments created a comprehensive scheme for the inspection of vessels,[4] including periodic inspection of hulls and boilers,[5] and compliance must be had with the requirements of the statutes.[6] In accordance with statutory provisions, inspectors must be satisfied that a vessel is in a condition to warrant the belief that she may be used in navigation with safety to life, and that all the requirements of law with respect to fires, boats, life preservers, etc., are faithfully complied with.[7] Ordinarily only federal local inspectors can perform duties of inspection imposed by statute.[8]

Compliance must be had with provisions pertaining to personnel of vessels,[9] as with respect to the necessary complement of officers of a vessel[10] and their standing watches of a certain duration.[11]

98. U.S.—Bryan v. Union Oil Co of California, C C A Cal., 155 F.2d 625 58 C J p 39 note 6.

Basis of rule

Under the rule that, when a person by a compulsion of the color of legal process or of seizure of his persons or goods pays money unlawfully demanded, he may recover it back, an action lies against collector of customs to recover overpayment of tonnage taxes paid under threat of forfeiture of vessel—Union Oil Co of California v. Bryan, D C Cal, 52 F. Supp 256, affirmed, C C A, Bryan v. Union Oil Co. of California, 155 F.2d 625.

Formal protest

Where master's tendered oath that vessel cleared from Canadian port, which would have subjected vessel to lower tonnage tax, was refused by collector of customs, facts that second oath was ultimately executed showing voyage to be Talara, Peru, and higher tax paid did not warrant defense that action would not lie for want of a formal protest—Bryan v. Union Oil Co. of Cal, C C A Cal, 155 F.2d 625

Word "final," as used in statute making final the decision of commissioner of navigation on questions relating to collection and refund of tonnage tax, contemplates that decision shall be final in the department so that secretary of treasury shall not be burdened with duty of reviewing it and does not take away taxpayer's right of redress in the courts—Bryan v. Requirement of three licensed mates

The plain intent of a statute requiring every vessel of one thousand gross tons and over to have in her service and on board three licensed mates was that for a steamer of over one thousand gross tons there should be at least four officers, the captain and the three mates, who should share the burden of navigating her whenever any risk to the vessel was involved—The Denali, C C A Wash, 105 F 2d 413, adhered to 112 F.2d 952, certiorari denied Alaska S S Co v. "Watch"

The word "watch," in maritime parlance, has two meanings and refers to the division of the day into time periods of service of the officers and crew, and also to the division of such persons for that service, and, by

The fact that a duly licensed master leaves an experienced wheelman in charge of the wheel of a vessel to which a statute, requiring that certain vessels shall not be navigated without a licensed engineer and a licensed pilot applies, is not a violation of such statute.[12] The maritime safety laws are paramount to the National Labor Relations Act to the extent that any proposed order of the National Labor Relations Board may increase the danger which the safety legislation seeks to prevent or lessen.[13]

State regulation. A canal regulation requiring every barge to be manned by at least one man for each boat requires a man on each barge in a tow.[14] The fact that a state law relating to the inspection and regulation of vessels has remained unenforced for a long period does not render it inoperative.[15]

Rules promulgated by inspectors. The supervising inspectors are authorized to establish rules necessary to carry out the statutory provisions as to vessels, which rules have the force of law,[16] but they have no authority to establish regulations except such as relate to carrying out such provisions.[17]

Appeal from, and review of, decisions of inspectors. The courts have no authority to review findings of inspectors by appeal, or writ of error,[18] or by certiorari.[19] In the absence of any regulation governing the action of a supervising inspector in the exercise of his power to review on his own motion, under the statute, a decision of a board of local inspectors, the supervising inspector should follow, by analogy, the proceeding prescribed for appeals from decisions of the local board.[20]

b. Vessels or Equipment Included

Generally, statutory provisions relating to inspection of certain vessels, or regulating matters as to personnel or equipment, are applicable to vessels of the kind specified, and only to such vessels.

Generally, statutory provisions relating to inspection of certain vessels, or regulating matters as to personnel or equipment, are applicable to vessels of the kind specified, and only to such vessels.[21] Since steam was the only power used for mechanically propelled vessels at the time when the federal statutes pertaining to their regulation and inspection were originally enacted, the statutes referred immemorial Anglo-Saxon maritime custom, the time period of a watch never exceeds four hours—The Denali, C C A Wash, 105 F 2d 413, adhered to 112 F.2d 952, certiorari denied Alaska S S. Co. v Pacific Coast Coal Co., 61 S Ct 65, 311 U S 687, 85 L.Ed. 444.

Intent of statute

(1) The statutory three-watch requirement for mates on vessels of over one thousand gross tons is safety legislation designed to minimize the danger to human beings from hazards created by fatigue of the mates, as well as to prevent loss of cargo—The Denali, C C A Wash, 112 F 2d 952, certiorari denied Alaska S S Co. v. Pacific Coast Coal Co, 61 S Ct. 65, 311 U S 687, 85 L.Ed 444.

(2) The congressional intent disclosed by statute relating to division of mates into watches was to make impossible the former "watch and watch" system in which the crew was divided into two watches, starboard and port—The Denali, C C A Wash, 105 F 2d 413, adhered to 112 F 2d 952, certiorari denied Alaska S. S Co. v Pacific Coast Coal Co, 61 S. Ct. 65, 311 U.S 687, 85 L Ed. 444.

What constitutes compliance

(1) The statutory three-watch requirement for mates on vessel of over one thousand gross tons is not satisfied by having a complement of mates sufficient in number but who are required by the owner to stand on a two-watch instead of a three-watch division when the vessel is being navigated.—The Denali, C C A. Wash, 105 F 2d 413, adhered to 112 F 2d 952, certiorari denied Alaska S. S. Co v. Pacific Coast Coal Co, 61 S Ct 65, 311 U S 687, 85 L Ed. 444

(2) Where a mate stands a twelve-hour watch in two six-hour watches per day instead of but eight hours per day in alternating with two mates, there is a violation of the three-watch provision for mates—The Denali, C C A Wash, 112 F.2d 952, certiorari denied Alaska S S Co v Pacific Coast Coal Co, 61 S Ct 65, 311 U S 687, 85 L Ed 444.

A seagoing ocean barge of more than one hundred gross tons carrying passengers is subject to the jurisdiction of local federal inspectors who have power to require sufficient transverse watertight bulkheads fitted so that barge will remain afloat with positive stability if any one main compartment is flooded—Carr v. Hermosa Amusement Corporation, C C A Cal, 137 F 2d 983, certiorari denied Hermosa Amusement Corp v Carr, 64 S Ct 520, 321 U S 764, 88 L Ed 1060

State regulation

A canal regulation requiring all boats to be equipped with a rudder and a wheelsman except such as are equipped to tow safely with two hawsers or use other suitable steering equipment does not require a wheelsman on a boat which does not have a wheel or tiller—In re O'Donnell, C.C A N.Y, 34 F.2d 925.

only to steam vessels,[22] and accordingly it was held that a watercraft which was neither a steam vessel nor a sailing vessel within the general statute providing for periodic inspection of hulls, and the inspection of which was not otherwise provided for, was not subject to inspection.[23] By reason of an amendment to the statutes in 1933, the provisions of the statutes were extended to vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam or by any other form of mechanical or electrical power.[24]

Under some statutes pertaining to small craft, inspection requirements are imposed on various types of small steam craft,[25] or to vessels above a certain tonnage, operated for hire, propelled by gas, fluid, naphtha, or electricity,[26] or to vessels of such a nature without regard to tonnage or use.[27] In accordance with statutory provisions, the hull and equipment of "seagoing" barges of one hundred gross tons or over are subject to inspection and regulation,[28] and such a provision has been construed to include watercraft, otherwise within the statute, which have no means of self-propulsion, but which may be taken as tows.[29] The appliances enumerated in the statute as necessary equipment of the barge are not the only equipment to which the requirement of inspection extends.[30]

Inspection of repairs to boiler or of unfinished vessel. The requirement as to inspection of a boiler before use applies where substantial repairs have been made on such boiler,[31] but it has been held that an unfinished vessel need not be inspected before being removed from one place to another in the course of her construction.[32]

Foreign, interstate, or intra-state commerce. While certain earlier statutes as to inspection did not apply to vessels which were not engaged in interstate or foreign commerce,[33] and some of the earlier cases construed the statutes under consideration as excluding vessels which were not engaged in interstate or foreign commerce,[34] certain statutes have been regarded as extending the operation of the inspection laws to vessels navigating waters of the United States which are common highways of commerce, or open to general or competitive navigation, even though such vessels are not engaged in interstate or foreign commerce.[35] Under a statute relating to the establishment of load lines on certain vessels and inspection of vessels with respect thereto, a "merchant ship" or "merchant vessel" within the statute and regulations thereunder is a ship employed in commerce.[36]

certain vessels shall not be permitted to depart from a port of the United States unless a certain per cent of the crew are able to understand the orders of the officers, and unless a certain per cent are of a rating not less than able seamen, although not expressly exempting foreign vessels, does not apply to such vessels.[37] Similarly, the statutory provision that every coastwise sea-going vessel shall, when under way, except on the high seas, be under control and direction of pilots licensed by the inspector of steamboats does not apply to a foreign vessel.[38]

§ 6. Licensing and Discipline of Personnel

Statutes providing for the licensing of certain officers of vessels, by the board of local inspectors, after an examination as to character, experience, and habits, have been construed and given effect. Under provisions for the suspension and revocation of licenses, the proceedings must, in substance, conform to requirements as to notice and hearing.

A statute providing for the licensing of certain officers of vessels, by the board of local inspectors, after an examination as to character, experience, and habits, has been construed and given effect.[39]

Suspension and revocation. Statutory provisions for the suspension and revocation of licenses have been treated as penal, and, therefore, have been strictly construed in favor of the licensed officer concerned.[40] Original jurisdiction in this regard is, under statute, vested solely in the board of local inspectors,[41] and, since the jurisdiction of supervising inspectors and of the supervising inspector general is appellate and revisory only,[42] an attempt by the supervising inspector to exercise original jurisdiction in respect of suspension or revocation is ineffectual.[43] The proceedings before the board of local inspectors must, in substance, conform to requirements as to notice and hearing,[44] and a mere general investigation in which no charges are preferred against the particular officer concerned is not a compliance with the statute[45] and is not sufficient to authorize a suspension or revocation of a license.[46] The supervising inspector by a review of the conclusion of the local board in such general investigation may not invest himself with authority to suspend or revoke a license.[47]

The authority of the Coast Guard commandant to make rules and regulations does not include the right to suspend a seaman's certificate of service without a hearing in violation of statutory provision,[48] and the examiner presiding in disciplinary proceedings does not have authority to suspend the certificate of service of the accused seaman before final determination in the proceeding.[49]

Production or impounding of certificate of service. An examiner appointed by the Coast Guard commandant to preside at hearings in the adjudication of disciplinary actions against seamen under a statute providing for investigation of marine casualties has authority to issue subpœnas requiring seamen to present their licenses, if needed as evidence, and the district court has jurisdiction to compel obedience to such subpœnas.[50] However, the court will not require the production of such documents where not authorized by law,[51] and the impounding of the certificate of service of a seaman pending final disposition of disciplinary action against him is improper since it would deprive him of the right to follow his vocation while the charges are pending, the production of the certificate being necessary to obtain employment.[52]

Appeal or review. Appellate and revisory jurisdiction in respect of decisions as to the suspension or revocation of licenses of officers of vessels is vested in the supervising inspectors[53] and the supervising inspector general.[54] While proceedings before the supervising inspectors in respect of the suspension or revocation of a license are more or less summary, and technical requirements should not be insisted on,[55] there should, at least, be a substantial compliance with the governing law.[56] The right of a stranger to the proceeding to appeal to the supervising inspector from a decision of the local inspectors granting a license has been denied,[57] and the act of the supervising inspector who directs the revocation of a license, in such an appeal by a stranger, is ineffective.[58] In the absence of any regulation governing the action of supervising inspectors in the exercise of their revisory power over the local boards of inspection in respect of suspension or revocation of licenses, they should follow by analogy the practice prescribed for appeal from the local boards, and require that the record of proceeding before the local board shall be certified by the supervising inspector.[59]

Where seamen against whom disciplinary actions were pending under statute providing for investigation of marine casualties admitted that they held certificates of service and no question was raised as to such certificates being delivered to, and held by, them, requiring them to produce and deliver such certificates to presiding examiner was not justified on ground that they were needed as evidence in the case—In re Merchant Mariners Documents Issued to Dimitratos, supra.

Where judicial review of the decision of the commandant of the Coast Guard relative to certificates of service and merchant mariners' documents in an investigation of marine casualties is sought, and the commandant is not served with notice, such review will be denied for lack of jurisdiction.[60] It has further been held that it is doubtful whether the court has authority to interfere with the commandant's order, it being final and binding on the parties for all purposes;[61] and even where the court has jurisdiction to review the order, in the absence of a finding that was clearly erroneous and in the absence of a showing of arbitrary or like misconduct, the findings and order of the commandant will be affirmed.[62]

§ 7. Filing Manifest and Obtaining Clearance of Vessels

Clearance is in effect a vessel's passport granted to it when sailing to a foreign port, and, since congress has power to control the manner and terms on which clearance shall be granted or withheld, compliance must be had with the requirements of the statute specifying how a clearance may be obtained.

Clearances have a history in the maritime law extending over hundreds of years.[63] A clearance is in effect a vessel's passport,[64] and it is granted to vessels sailing to a foreign port.[65] Congress has power to control the manner and terms on which clearance shall be granted or withheld,[66] and the requirements as to how a clearance may be obtained, specified in the statute, should be complied with,[67] including provisions as to matters to be contained in the oaths of the master[68] and of the shipper.[69] So also, the collector is neither bound[70] nor authorized[71] to grant a clearance until a proper manifest is presented to him. In this respect, a "manifest" is defined as a written instrument containing a true account of the cargo of a ship or commercial vessel and which must contain a list of all the packages or separate items of freight with their distinct marks.[72] A place fixed by longitude and latitude on the high seas, where vessels were to be met and provisioned, is not "port" within

"Clearance"

(1) In maritime law "clearance" is a document in the nature of a certificate given by the collector of customs to an outwardbound vessel to the effect that she has complied with the law, and is duly authorized to depart —Black L.D.—11 C.J. p 835 note 75.

(2) Other definitions see 11 C J. p 836 notes 76–78.

"Clear"

In maritime law, the term "clear" means to satisfy the customs, harbor dues, and the like, and to obtain from the governmental authority of the port leave to depart —International Mercantile Marine Co. v Stranahan, C C N Y., 155 F 428, affirmed 29 S Ct 671, 214 U.S 320, 53 L Ed 1013, followed in 29 S.Ct. 678, 213 U S. 344, 53 L Ed 1024.

"Clearing" is the departure of a vessel from port, after complying with the customs and health laws and like local regulations —Black L. D.

the statutory meaning of the statutory provisions as to clearance.[73]

While the circumstances may be such as to support a refusal of a clearance, even though the documents presented are regular on their face,[74] where there has been a compliance with the statutory requirements, it is in general the duty of the collector to grant a clearance,[75] and for a breach of duty in this regard he is liable for damages,[76] notwithstanding he acted under instructions from the secretary of the treasury in refusing a clearance.[77] Under a statute providing that no vessel shall be granted clearance while a fine remains unpaid, except that clearance may be granted prior to determination of such question on deposit of a bond with sufficient surety to secure payment thereof, the word "determine" in the context of the statute means administratively determined,[78] and the collector of customs may lawfully refuse clearance until payment of the fine, where such refusal occurred after administrative determination of the question, notwithstanding posting of bond.[79]

a. In General

Governmental regulations and controls affecting the sale, chartering, use and operation of vessels during wartime have been held valid.

Governmental regulations and controls affecting the sale, chartering, use and operation of vessels during wartime have been held valid.[83] The United States, by taking protective custody of a foreign ship in an American port to prevent her destruction and loss by sabotage, does not assume to pay or discharge prior debts and liens against the vessel for coal, foodstuffs, and supplies furnished the vessel.[84]

b. Requisition of Vessels in General

Statutes held not conflicting

The statute relating to the requisitioning of foreign-owned vessels within the jurisdiction of the United States has been held not to be in conflict with a statute relating to forfeinational emergency, is authorized; but compensation must be paid in accordance with the provisions of law, as discussed infra subdivision d of this section. The statutory right to requisition a vessel owned by an American citizen during the national emergency is not affected by the fact that the vessel is in the custody of a court of admiralty,[87] and in the case of a foreign-owned vessel, also, it is immaterial to the application of the statute whether or not the vessel is subject to litigation.[88] The requisitioning of foreign ships permits them to be used for purposes vital to the prosecution of the war but does not take them from the custody of the courts,[89] and where a court has prior custody and jurisdiction of the vessel in forfeiture proceedings it may, notwithstanding the requisition, continue its technical custody and jurisdiction and provide for restoration of the vessel to the custody of the court marshal on release by the government agency requisitioning the vessel.[90] In requisitioning foreign ships, the United States merely takes over whatever rights the claimants may have, and there is nothing inconsistent in such requisitioning and in the forfeiture of such ships for sabotage.[91]

Under the statute the power to requisition vessels under conditions fixed by the statute is intrusted to a designated administrative agency,[92] and when to requisition rests in the sound discretion of such agency.[93] The motive of a public officer in ordering the requisition of a domestic vessel is not open to judicial inquiry.[94]

c. War Risk Insurance

The liability of the United States on a war risk insurance policy issued under statutes authorizing the issuance of policies of war risk insurance on certain vessels and their cargo is to be determined in accordance with the provisions of the policy.

insurance policy issued under statutes authorizing the issuance of policies of war risk insurance on certain vessels and their cargo is to be determined in accordance with the provisions of the policy.[95] General rules apply with respect to the validity of issuance and delivery of the policy.[96] The delivery of a war risk insurance binder after known loss of the vessel may be valid,[97] and, where the government was under statutory obligation to furnish war risk insurance at the time of requisition of use of a vessel, the fact that the vessel requisitioned was lost through enemy action some time before the actual execution of the charter and insurance binder was held not to render such insurance ultra vires.[98]

No liability exists under a war risk insurance policy except for a loss covered thereby,[99] and the intention of the parties to the policy is controlling in determining whether a particular loss is within the coverage of the policy.[1] Generally, war risk insurance covers losses due to perils superimposed on usual marine perils by war,[2] and, under the terms of the policy, losses for which liability exists are those only which are "consequences of hostilities or warlike operations."[3] So the coverage of such a policy extends only to perils due directly to some hostile action, military maneuver, or operational war danger, and does not include aggravation or increase of maritime risk because of war operations.[4] There must be a causal connection between the warlike operation and the occurrence which resulted in the loss,[5] and the existence or nonexistence of causal connection between the peril insured against by the policy and the loss is determined by looking to the factual situation in each case and applying the concept of proximate cause.[6]

Question of fact

Whether a vessel is engaged in warlike operation at time of loss is essentially a question of fact.—U.S. v. Standard Oil Co. of N.J., D.C.N.Y., 81 F.Supp. 183, reversed on other grounds, C.A., 178 F.2d 488, affirmed 71 S.Ct. 135, 340 U.S. 54, 95 L.Ed. 68, followed in Libby, McNeill & Libby v. U.S., Ct.Cl., 71 S.Ct. 144, 340 U.S. 71, 95 L.Ed. 86.

Creation of peril

A loss will be held to be a "consequence of hostilities" and to come within limits of war risk policy where one of the vessels party to the loss is both engaged in warlike operation and so navigating as result of the war that it creates a peril.—U.S. v. Standard Oil Co. of N.J., C.A.N.Y., 178 F.2d 488, affirmed 71 S.Ct. 135, 340 U.S. 54, 95 L.Ed. 68, followed in Libby, McNeill & Libby v. U.S., Ct.Cl., 71 S.Ct. 144, 340 U.S. 71, 95 L.Ed. 86

Defensive operations

Warlike operations include and cover operations defensive as well as offensive in character.—U.S. v. Standard Oil Co. of N.J., D.C.N.Y., 81 F.Supp. 183, reversed on other grounds, C.A., 178 F.2d 488, affirmed 71 S.Ct. 135, 340 U.S. 54, 95 L.Ed. 68, followed in Libby, McNeill & Libby v. U.S., Ct.Cl., 71 S.Ct. 144, 340 U.S. 71, 95 L.Ed. 86.

Loss held not within risk insured

(1) In general.—U.S. v. Standard Oil Co. of N.J., C.A.N.Y., 178 F.2d 488, affirmed 71 S.Ct. 135, 340 U.S. 54, 95 L.Ed. 68, followed in Libby, McNeill & Libby v. U.S., Ct.Cl., 71 S.Ct. 144, 340 U.S. 71, 95 L.Ed. 86.

(2) Where there was no causal connection between stranding of vessel when inexperienced helmsman made mistake in steering and vessel's warlike operation of transporting military supplies and personnel between war bases, the stranding was not "consequence of warlike operations" within policy insuring vessel against war risks, including all consequences of warlike operations.—Libby, McNeill & Libby v. Peril common to all vessels

Where a vessel engaged in a warlike operation suffers damage because of a peril common to war vessels and nonwar vessels alike, the marine underwriters, rather than war risk underwriters, will be held liable.—U.S. v. Standard Oil Co. of N.J., C.A.N.Y., 178 F.2d 488, affirmed 71 S.Ct. 135, 340 U.S. 54, 95 L.Ed. 68, followed in Libby, McNeill & Libby v. U.S., Ct.Cl., 71 S.Ct. 144, 340 U.S. 71, 95 L.Ed. 86.

6. U.S.—Standard Oil Co. of N.J. v. U.S., N.Y., 71 S.Ct. 135, 340 U.S.

Suit to enforce liability on a war risk insurance policy may be brought in the court specified by statute.[7] In accordance with the terms of the statute, suit may be instituted where there is a disagreement between insurer and insured as to a claim for loss on account of such insurance,[8] and an administrative determination of just compensation for the loss is not required as a condition precedent to commencement of the action.[9] Even if such a determination were required as a condition precedent to suit, the condition is one which could be waived,[10] and the refusal of the proper board or officer to act within a reasonable time after known loss of the vessel constitutes a determination that no amount was payable on the insurance or an election waiving its right to make one.[11] There is no obligation on the part of insured to bring a proceeding to compel the making of such administrative determination.[12] The owner claiming that the loss resulted from a war risk, rather than a marine risk, so as to be within the coverage of the policy, has the burden of proof.[13]

d. Compensation for Requisition or Loss by War Risk

Generally, under the statutes authorizing the requisition of certain vessels for use by the federal government, the government is obliged to pay just compensation for the taking or use, and a similar liability for just compensation exists where there has been a loss of a vessel under a policy of war risk insurance issued by the United States.

Generally, under the statutes authorizing the requisition of certain vessels for use by the federal government, the government is obliged to pay "just compensation" for the taking or use,[14] and a similar liability for "just compensation" exists where there has been a loss of a vessel under a policy of war risk insurance issued by the United States or an agency thereof, fixing the amount of insurance as "just compensation" to be determined under the provisions of the Merchant Marine Act.[15] The term "just compensation" as used in the statute authorizing payment of just compensation to the own-

Collision with moving warship

The proximate cause method of determining on the facts of each case whether a loss is consequence of warlike operations and therefore a war insurance risk will be applied rather than English decisions purportedly announcing the rule that the mere showing of loss from collision with moving warship establishes liability under war risk policy as a matter of law.—Standard Oil Co. of N. J. v. U. S., N.Y., 71 S.Ct. 135, 340 U.S. 54, 95 L.Ed. 68, followed in Libby, McNeill & Libby v. U. S., Ct.Cl., 71 S.Ct. 144, 340 U.S. 71, 95 L.Ed. 86.

7. U.S.—De La Rama S. S. Co. v. U. S., D.C.N.Y., 98 F.Supp. 514, reversed on other grounds C.A., 198 F.2d 182.

Effect of repeal of statute

Although United States incurred war risk insurance liability through loss of requisitioned motor vessel and libel on claim was commenced and pending in federal district court prior to repeal of statutory provision giving district court jurisdiction to hear such claim, after the repeal district court no longer had jurisdiction of libel.—De La Rama S.S. Co. v. U. S., C.A.N.Y., 198 F.2d 182.

Petition to court of claims

Where libelant, which had already initiated proceeding on claim for war risk insurance, filed petition for just compensation in United States court of claims shortly before expiration of statute of limitations for such claim, such filing was not determinative of jurisdiction of district court to hear pending claim for war risk insurance.—De La Rama S.S. Co. v. U. S., D.C.N.Y., 98 F.Supp. 514, reversed on other grounds, C.A., 198 F.2d 182.

Impossibility of adjusting claim before running of limitations

Failure of War Shipping Administration to adjust claim for loss on account of war risk insurance and its statement that it would be impossible to dispose of matter by time the statute of limitations would have afforded it complete defense constituted disagreement as to insurance claim sufficient to authorize owner of lost vessel to bring libel.—De La Rama S.S. Requisition on time charter basis

Where the government requisitioned a vessel on a time-charter basis and issued a war risk binder defining the amount of insurance as "just compensation" to be determined under the Merchant Marine Act, the amount of damages to be awarded the owner for total loss of the vessel was the sum that would be considered just compensation for the vessel as though, at the time of such loss, the vessel had been requisitioned as to title by the government.—The Virginia, D.C.Del., 73 F.Supp. 622, affirmed, C.A., National Bulk Carriers v. U.S., 169 F.2d 943.

Vessel rebuilt after constructive total loss

Where government requisitioned vessel on time-charter basis and vessel was torpedoed but remained afloat and was subsequently rebuilt after having been found a constructive total loss, amount of award in action by owner to recover just compensation was to be determined as though vessel had actually been sunk and thereby became a complete and total loss to her owner.—National Bulk Carriers v. U.S., D.C.Del., 82 F.Supp. 495.

er of a vessel requisitioned or purchased by the government in time of emergency means the same as "just compensation" in the Fifth Amendment to the federal Constitution, and is subject to general principles announced by the courts in awarding just compensation under the Fifth Amendment[16] The determination as to what constitutes just compensation is a matter for the courts,[17] and while they are not necessarily bound by the terms of the statute authorizing the requisition of vessels, since provision for just compensation is specifically a constitutional matter, they may, in arriving at what compensation is just, consider the factors impelling congress to enact certain provisions as to compensation.[18] Rules formulated for the guidance of an administrative body administering the Merchant Marine Act, with respect to what constitutes just compensation, are entitled to great respect, but such rules may not run counter to provisions of the statute.[19]

Generally speaking, just compensation for a vessel requisitioned or lost under a policy of war risk insurance is the value of the property taken at the time of the taking,[20] or, as otherwise stated, the fair and reasonable value of the vessel,[21] and not necessarily the cost of the vessel to the owner,[22] or reproduction cost,[23] less depreciation. The determination of value of a ship cannot be reduced to inexorable rules,[24] that is, ascertainment of value is not controlled by artificial rules, but must be a reasonable judgment having its basis in a proper consideration of all relevant facts[25] The court will consider each vessel as an individual thing, and its value at the time of taking will be determined from all evidence in the record and in the light of conditions then existing,[26] value must be determined in the light of all the circumstances which properly go into an appraisal of value[27] In accordance with these rules, particular awards have been held to constitute just compensation for the requisition of a vessel or for its loss under a policy of war risk insurance.[28] An award may include interest to the extent permitted by law.[29]

Where insurance was issued by the government in connection with its requisition time charter of the vessel, the date of valuation has been said to be fixed as of the time of requisition, that is, the value as of the date of beginning of the risk under the policy,[30] rather than as of the date of loss.[31] It has also been held, however, that if a ship is sunk or otherwise reduced to a total loss due to a war risk while in government use under requisition the date of loss is considered to be the date on which the government finally completely took the ship for all purposes rather than just for use, and it must pay just compensation as of that date,[32] rather than as of the date of requisition.[33]

Measurement of value; factors considered. Ordinarily, just compensation for the loss or taking of a vessel is measured by fair market value where a market is shown to exist.[34] In determining market value, resort may be had to evidence of sales of comparable vessels on or near the date of loss,[35] and if there are no sales of like ships, then resort may be had to other evidence.[36] Sales of comparable vessels by the maritime commission ordi-

What constitutes "market value"

"Market value" at time of requisition of purchase of vessel by government in time of emergency is sum that would in all probability result from fair negotiations between owner willing to sell and buyer desiring to buy and ship can have "market value," notwithstanding no one ship is precisely like another and is not subject to daily quotation on some exchange.—U. S. v. Buxton Lines, C.C.A.Va., 165 F.2d 993—The Virginia, D.C.Del., 73 F.Supp. 622, affirmed, C.A., National Bulk Carriers v. U. S., 169 F.2d 943.

Free market

The market to be considered in ascertaining market value as a measure of just compensation for loss of a steamship is a free market, if such exists, at time and place of taking, even though market itself may be considered abnormal due to state of economy at time, either because of war, depression, or other factors.—De La Rama S. S. Co. v. U. S., D.C.N.Y., 92 F.Supp. 243.

Place of market

Price at the market nearest the taking is neither practical nor fair in determining value of vessel requisitioned for public use, since owners would, if possible, sell without geographic restriction.—U. S. v. Toronto, Hamilton & Buffalo Nav. Co., Ct.Cl., 70 S.Ct. 217, 338 U.S. 396, 94 L.Ed. 195.

Projection of former market

In order to avoid purely capricious valuations having no relation to true value, every effort should be made to bridge gap during which there was no market for a ship requisitioned by the government by projecting the former market, if not too remote, on the trend shown by the evidence, or of which the court is judicially aware, thus reaching as nearly as the court can, the figure that the court thinks a willing buyer would have given a willing seller for the ship.—Ramselius v. U. S., 90 F.Supp. 547, 116 Ct.Cl. 612—Smith-Douglass Co. v. U. S., Ct.Cl., 81 F.Supp. 215.

narily may be considered, even though such sales were made at cost and without competition,[37] but sales by such commission may, in certain circumstances, be insufficient to constitute a market on which valuation of a lost vessel may be based,[38] as where the sales were subject to unusual conditions and restrictions.[39]

Where the market value of a vessel cannot be ascertained because of the absence of a market, resort must be had to other data in order to ascertain the value of the vessel for purposes of compensating the owner,[40] even though the inquiry may involve what is, at best, a guess by informed persons.[41] In the absence of a free market, the basis of valuation must be a composite one, based on such factors as reconstruction cost less depreciation, the manner in which the vessel had been kept up, appraisals for insurance purposes, earning capacity, original cost where appropriate, the extent of demand compared to supply, the amount of war risk insurance obtainable, restrictions to which ships were subject, and other relevant factors.[42]

Probable market value

Where there is no market value of requisitioned vessel, other evidence may be resorted to, and value of vessel at time of loss may be taken to be the sum which, considering all circumstances, probably could have been obtained for her on the date of the loss, which is a sum that in all probability would result from fair negotiations between an owner willing to buy or sell and a purchaser desiring to buy —National Bulk Carriers v. (8) Additional cost of features not present in vessel to make it comply with safety features required of newly constructed ships —Baltimore Steam Packet Co. v U. S, 81 F.Supp 707, 112 Ct Cl. 433

(9) Immediate availability of vessel for service due to excellent condition at time of taking, where good condition of vessel had already been taken into consideration in determining the proper rate of depreciation — Baltimore Steam Packet Co v. U. S, 81 F.Supp. 707, 112 Ct Cl. 433.

Under the provisions of the statute, the value of the vessel taken or used is not to be deemed enhanced by the causes necessitating the taking or use;[43] and accordingly, in determining just compensation, the fact that the government may need the vessel for prosecution of the war should not be permitted to act as an inflationary force on the value of the vessel.[44] However, the government is not to be placed in a more advantageous position than other purchasers, and it takes the vessel subject to the enhancement arising out of the high prices[45] and increased business[46] of a war-time economy; and the owner is not restricted to nominal compensation merely because he would not have been able to sell or charter the vessel or to realize any income from it because of war-time conditions and restrictions.[47] No deduction from the fair value of the vessel because of the war situation is justified without proof, first, that there was a known program to condemn all vessels similar to the one involved, and, second, that the amount sought to be deducted accrued as a result of speculation because of imminent prospective condemnation of the vessel which was part of the program.[48] Further, in order for the enhancement of value to be deductible under the statute, as resulting from the government's need of vessels necessitating the taking, the need must be shown to be a need for the precise ship taken, for the type or class of ship taken, or for ships which perform the same or related functions[49]

In ascertaining just compensation, the valuation may be fixed at a certain amount per dead-weight ton, such amount being then multiplied by the number of dead-weight tons, instead of fixing the value of the ship as a whole.[50] In determining the value of the government's use of a vessel for which compensation must be paid, the court may employ a formula based on a yearly payment of a certain per cent of the value of the vessel, depending on the length of the charter.[51] In the case of compensation sought for the requisitioning of use of a vessel, the owner is entitled to recover for repairs to the vessel found to be necessary at the time of rede-

Need before or after declaration of emergency

The enhancement of the value of a vessel requisitioned by the government, in order to be excluded under the statute in fixing just compensation for the vessel when that enhancement is due to the government's needs, is that which arises before, as well as after, declaration of a national emergency —U. S. v. Cors, supra.

Shortage due to requisitioning program

Where, at time of requisition of tug by government, there was a rising market and strong demand for tugs of all types, due in part at least to shortage of tugs resulting from government's requisitioning program, the enhanced value reflected speculation as to what government could be compelled to pay and was not a fair "market value" which could be used as criterion in fixing just compensation for vessel requisitioned — U. S v. Cors, supra.

Evidence as to probability of taking

(1) Under rule that if taking of vessel was within reasonably probable scope of a program for the condemnation of vessels, known to have been initiated by the government, any increase in value incident to speculation as to what the government might be required to pay is to be eliminated, the fact that the taking was within the scope of the program may be evidenced by the taking of similar vessels or anything else that might show that the taking of the vessel in question was reasonably probable —Cors v. U. S., 75 F Supp. 235, 110 Ct.Cl 66, reversed on other grounds 69 S Ct. 1086, 337 U S 325, 93 L Ed. 1392.

livery,[52] and the United States is entitled to the amount by which the fair value of unbroached consumable stores, fuel, water, expendable equipment, and spare parts on vessels when they were redelivered to the owner exceeded the fair value of such stores, fuel, water, equipment, and parts on the vessels when they were delivered under requisition.[53] The United States may not be held liable to the owner for the expense of maintaining crews on the vessel prior to the requisitioning of title by the government on the ground that he did so at the direction of a government official, in the absence of showing that the official had authority to bind the United States.[54] Where the government, instead of exercising the option to purchase contained in a charter agreement, requisitions the vessel, the owner has no right to recover any rental or lease moneys after the actual requisition and any damages sustained by him are damages of frustration and not of appropriation.[55]

Right of appeal to courts. Under the provision of the statute that just compensation for the taking of a vessel shall be determined and paid by the appropriate government agency, and providing for suit if compensation so determined is unsatisfactory, the owner of requisitioned property has the right to appeal to the courts to determine just compensation,[56] and such right cannot be taken away by refusal of the government agency to act or by unreasonable delay in acting[57]

e. Claims against Requisitioned Vessel or Compensation Fund

The statute authorizing the requisition of vessels for national defense does not abolish lien claims against the requisitioned vessel, or claimant's available remedies which may be pursued as before in any court of competent jurisdiction; but under such statute the lienholder may or should assert his claim against the fund deposited by the government as compensation for the taking or use of the vessel by suit in admiralty.

the statute[62] The statute authorizes suit against the compensation fund only in the case of lien claims, and other creditors of the owner of the vessel have no rights therein.[63]

A suit to enforce a lien claim against the compensation fund cannot be commenced until after the fund is deposited, and, when instituted, must be commenced within a specified time after the deposit has been made.[64] The court in such suit may in a proper case enter a decree in favor of claimant for the amount of his claim,[65] together with interest and costs authorized by law,[66] subject to prior payment of senior claims against the fund.[67] The length of time the fund deposited as compensation should be held and the disposition thereof are largely within the discretion of the trial court, which will not be interfered with in the absence of abuse.[68] The court will not, except for good cause shown, postpone a decree enforcing a valid claim against the fund;[69] and it may provide for the payment of a valid prior claim against the fund without first determining the exact amount to which the owner of the vessel is entitled as just compensation, and without first adjudicating the extent of any other valid claims against the fund.[70]

Tangible evidence of harm

In order to justify postponement of decree against fund deposited by United States for value of requisitioned foreign merchant vessel, there must be some tangible evidence of harm to some actual person, and mere surmises of harm to unknown persons who may not even exist are not enough.—U. S. v. Grain Importers (Eire), C.C.A.Mass., 144 F.2d 921.

er of a vessel duly requisitioned by the director general had at least a reversionary interest in the vessel,[73] and this was a sufficient interest to induce the execution of a general average bond by the owner as principal, or on his own behalf as against a claim that such owner executed the bond as agent for the director general.[74] A cargo owner could properly claim the benefits of a general average bond executed by the owner of the vessel so requisitioned to prevent process against such vessel, executed at a time when it was at least doubtful whether process of arrest could properly issue against such vessel.[75] The carriers' systems under the control of the director general were operated as separate systems, including vessels which were connected with various railroad systems.[76]

Interstate commerce regulations. In respect of his operation of vessels as common carriers, the director general was subject to the federal act to regulate commerce[77] and to all the rules and regulations of the Interstate Commerce Commission,[78] except in so far as there might be inconsistency with the Federal Control Act.[79] A general manager in respect of particular waterways, appointed by the director general for the acquisition and operation of equipment for use on waterways, as contemplated by the Federal Control Act, was authorized to enter into a special contract for the carriage of goods in respect of which there was no established tariff of rates.[80]

Suits or actions. The right to prosecute a suit in admiralty against the director general in respect of the use and operation of vessels or other property taken over as part of a railroad system was recognized or upheld,[81] but the director general could be held liable in respect of vessels taken over only to the extent, and under the conditions, prescribed by applicable statutes and orders duly issued under such statutes.[82] Suit could be maintained in a proper case, even though the property of the railroad company was not at the time of the alleged wrong being used for common carrier purposes[83] So the director general or the agent designated by the president was liable to a suit for a maritime tort, resulting in injury to the vessel of a third person, of a vessel taken over in connection with the carrier's railroad system,[84] even though the service which was being performed by such vessel at the time of the commission of the tort was not that of a common carrier.[85]

The director general could not, however, be held liable in tort to the carrier as owner of a vessel taken over under the statute, for the loss of such vessel,[86] and settlement with the government on the part of such owner, for the loss of the vessel, did not discharge the owner of another vessel jointly liable for the loss.[87] It was held that the provision of the statute, applicable to property of carriers taken over by the government, that no process mesne or final should be levied on any property under federal control, prevented a proceeding in rem against a vessel operated by the director general;[88] but the contrary view was also taken,[89] and it was held that, where the carrier had itself invoked the jurisdiction of the court by filing an original libel, it could be required to furnish security in respect of a cross libel filed against a vessel owned by such carrier but operated by the director general.[90]

The rule that each railroad system, including the vessels which were part of such system, was to be treated as a separate entity applied in respect of liability for a maritime tort.[91] So the director general in court as defendant in connection with the operation of a vessel taken over as part of the system of one railroad could not be held liable for a tort committed in the operation of another vessel as part of another railroad system.[92] After a vessel had been returned to the carrier by the government the right to proceed in rem against such vessel has been upheld where the claim was one for which the government was not responsible,[93] notwithstanding the provision of the Transportation Act of 1920, under which carriers' property was returned by the government, that no execution or process shall be levied on the property of any carrier where the cause of action grew out of the possession, use, control, or operation of any railroad or system of transportation by the president, under federal control.[94]

Service on an agent of the director general of railroads, then operating the vessel involved in the action, was not a service on the business agent of the company which was the owner of the vessel so as to be effective against such company within the meaning of a state statute providing for service on a corporation by service on its business agent,[95] even though the person on whom service was attempted had, before the taking over of the vessel by the government, been an agent of the owner.[96]

§ 10. Status, Powers, and Duties of Administrative Officers

Under various statutes, federal administrative officers or bodies have been intrusted with certain powers and duties with respect to the regulation of shipping, but the government is not bound by any declaration or act of such a body unless it acts within the scope of its authority.

Under various statutes, federal administrative officers or bodies have been intrusted with certain powers and duties with respect to the regulation of shipping.[97] A body of this kind, such as a shipping board, is a governmental agency,[98] and a transfer to the board, by statute, of vessels acquired by the United States under certain emergency shipping statutes has been held not to divest the title of the United States.[99] As in the case of an agent of the United States generally, the government is not bound by any declaration or act of the administrative board unless such board acted within the scope of its authority,[1] and a person who deals with the board or with any of its employees is bound to take notice of the extent of the authority conferred by the law on the board or any of its employees.[2] In the absence of statutory authorization the administrative board cannot delegate its authority.[3] An order of the maritime commission is not self-executing but requires the sanction of a court of law in order to become effectual.[4]

a. In general
b. Particular grounds
c. When forfeiture occurs; rights of third persons
d. Enforcement
e. Remission or restoration and protection of owners or lienors

a. In General

Penalties and forfeitures provided for by the registration laws are not necessarily applicable to enrolled vessels. While a forfeiture statute is to be given a reasonable construction, a statute imposing a penalty in respect of a vessel should be strictly construed against the United States.

The statutory provision that in order for enrollment the vessel shall possess the same qualifications, and the same requisites, in all respects, shall be complied with, as are necessary for registering vessels does not make applicable to enrolled vessels the same penalties and forfeitures as are provided for by the registration laws.[5] While a forfeiture statute of the type here considered is to be given a reasonable construction,[6] it is not to be given the harsher of two equally reasonable constructions,[7] and a doubt as to whether a forfeiture statute applies to the particular facts under consideration has been resolved against the United States.[8] So it has been held that a statute imposing a penalty in respect of a vessel should be strictly construed against the United States.[9]

Forfeiture for breach of the navigation laws is strictly in rem,[10] and is not dependent on a preliminary adjudication of personal guilt,[11] the vessel and not the owner is the offender under these laws, and the penalty is limited to forfeiture.[12] Generally a vessel may be subject to forfeiture in cases coming within the terms of the statutes even as against an innocent owner,[13] so that the innocence, or want of knowledge of a violation of law, on the part of the owner of the vessel is, in general, no defense to forfeiture in rem incurred under the navigation laws.[14] The rights of lienholders and other persons interested in the vessel are considered infra subdivision c of this section.

Effect of illegal seizure. The fact that the original seizure of the vessel proceeded against was illegal does not affect the government's right to claim a forfeiture where it subsequently adopted the seizure.[15]

Liability of officer. Generally an illegal seizure may render the responsible officer liable in damages.[16] However, under statutory provision for the granting of a certificate of reasonable cause for seizure, the officer who made the seizure is relieved from liability therefor when a libel for forfeiture is dismissed.[17]

b. Particular Grounds

(1) In general
(2) Violation of provisions as to inspection and personnel
(3) Failure to surrender enrollment and license and to procure registry for foreign voyage
(4) Wrongful procurement or use of register, enrollment, license, or number
(5) Prohibited sale or other transfer of vessel
(6) Unauthorized or unlicensed trade or use
(7) Importation or coastwise transportation of goods on other than vessels of United States
(8) Violation of Espionage Act

(1) In General

Recovery of penalties and forfeitures under statutes promulgating certain regulations with respect to vessels and providing sanctions may be had only in cases coming within their terms, as in the case of regulations concerning boarding of vessels by officers, running lights, transportation by foreign vessels of passengers between ports in the United States, and change of, or deception as to, the name of a vessel.

The particular grounds for recovery of penalties and forfeitures are fixed by the statutes promulgating certain regulations with respect to vessels and providing sanctions for their violation, and recovery may be had only in cases coming within their terms.[18] This rule applies with respect to statutes providing penalties for obstruction or hindrance to a revenue officer in lawfully going on board a vessel,[19] for running at night without lights,[20] for violation of the Load Line Act,[21] for violation of a statute prohibiting foreign vessels from transporting passengers between ports in the United States,[22] and for failure to deposit the ship's register with the consul or vice consul on arrival in a foreign port.[23]

Change of, or deception as to, name. Under a statute so providing, a vessel may be subject to forfeiture because of a change in the name of a vessel or because of deception, or attempt to deceive, in respect of the name;[24] but such statute does not apply to the registration of a new vessel in a name different from the name borne by an older vessel, although timber from the older vessel was used in the construction of the new vessel, where all such timber was taken up, refitted, and reset.[25] A change of name made after the sale of a vessel formerly licensed under the law of the United States, under admiralty process in a foreign court, does not render the vessel subject to forfeiture in a proceeding by the United States.[26] The statute does not apply to a vessel which is not documented.[27]

Failure to exhibit enrollment or license. The statutory provision, imposing a penalty on the master of a vessel for failure to exhibit enrollment or license to a revenue officer, when required, does not apply where the vessel has not been enrolled or licensed.[28]

Failure to file manifest and obtain clearance. The statute imposing a penalty on the master or other person in charge of a vessel for failure to file a manifest and obtain a clearance does not apply, it seems, where the vessel does not carry cargo or exports.[29]

Violation of rules of navigation. A statute may impose a penalty on the vessel for a violation of regulations preventing collisions on certain inland waters,[30] and such statute applies where the fault is solely that of the master,[31] even though, under the statute, the master is also liable for a penalty.[32] This provision imposing a penalty on the vessel does not render the vessel liable where the regulation violated was one established by the board of supervising inspectors, authorized by statute.[33]

Failure to obtain bill of health. In order to render applicable the statutory provision for a penalty against a vessel clearing and sailing from a foreign port to a port of the United States without the required bill of health, there must actually have been a clearance for a port of the United States.[34]

(2) Violation of Provisions as to Inspection and Personnel

Under a statute so providing, penalties are imposed against the owner of a steam vessel which is navigated in violation of statutory provisions in respect of inspection and related matters.

Under a statute so providing, penalties are imposed against the owner of a steam vessel which is navigated in violation of statutory provisions in respect of inspection and related matters.[35] Before the definition of steam vessels was broadened by the amendment of 1933 to include vessels propelled by any form of mechanical or electrical power, the statute did not apply to vessels propelled by gas, fluid, naphtha, or electric motors, although such vessels were by statute subject to provisions requiring inspection and licensed engineers and pilots.[36] It has been held that there is no liability under the statute imposing penalties in respect of noninspection where the vessel in question was navigated without inspection in connection with construction, while such vessel was in an unfinished state.[37] The owner of a vessel was not liable for the penalty for noninspection where, when the term covered by an inspection expired, she was in the hands of the federal government under military impressment.[38] In order to recover penalties for failure of a vessel to have a certificate of inspection on board at the time of leaving port, it must be established that the vessel was engaged in the carriage of freight or passengers for hire within the statute relating to inspection of vessels, at the time when the alleged penalties accrued.[39] Early state statutes as to penalties for failure to employ an engineer holding a certificate of competency have been construed and applied.[40]

(3) Failure to Surrender Enrollment and License and to Procure Registry for Foreign Voyage

In accordance with statutory provisions, a vessel may be subject to forfeiture for proceeding on a foreign voyage without giving up the vessel's enrollment and license, and without being registered. The term "foreign voyage" within the statute is one involving the departure from the United States for a foreign port with an intention there to engage in trade.

In accordance with statutory provisions, a vessel may be subject to forfeiture for proceeding on a foreign voyage without giving up the vessel's enrollment and license, and without being registered.[41] An enrolled vessel is liable to seizure and forfeiture for proceeding on a foreign voyage without registry,[42] although the enrollment and license have been surrendered.[43] It has been laid down in general terms that a "foreign voyage" within the statute is one involving the departure from the United States for a foreign port with an intention there to engage in trade,[44] and that it does not include a voyage of a fishing vessel to a foreign port on waters within the usual scope of the voyage of vessels licensed for the fisheries.[45]

The forfeiture does not attach until the vessel has left port with intent to proceed on a foreign voyage,[46] and, when there was an intention to stop at an intermediate port in the United States before the actual foreign part of the voyage was commenced, it was held that there was no ground for forfeiture under the statute in question.[47] It is not necessary that the vessel shall have performed a foreign voyage and returned to the United States.[48] It has been held that the destination, in order to constitute a foreign voyage, may be contact with another vessel at any point on the high seas,[49] but there is other authority which holds that the destination, in order to constitute a foreign voyage, is not any place on the high seas but must be a port or place exclusively within the sovereignty of a foreign nation.[50] A destination which is a point at sea within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States does not constitute a foreign voyage.[51] The provision of the statute permitting the forfeiture of merchandise "imported" in the vessel in question, does not include, and therefore does not, it has been held, authorize the forfeiture of, liquor seized on board the vessel on the high seas.[52]

(4) Wrongful Procurement or Use of Register, Enrollment, License, or Number

ment, or other record or document granted in lieu thereof, for any vessel not entitled to the benefit thereof.

Under a statute so providing, a vessel or its value may be forfeited where the owner knowingly makes a false oath in order to obtain registration.[53] It has been held that the statute does not apply to an oath containing allegations as to ownership based on legal title, although the beneficial ownership was in another.[54] So also, the statute does not apply to an oath for the enrollment of a vessel.[55]

Forfeiture has also been provided for knowingly and fraudulently[56] obtaining[57] or using[58] a certificate of registry, enrollment, or other record or document granted in lieu thereof, for any vessel not entitled to the benefit thereof. The number allotted to a vessel is a "record or document" granted in lieu of a certificate of registry, enrollment, or license, within the meaning of the statute regarding forfeiture for fraudulent obtaining or use.[59] Because of the highly penal character of the statute as to fraudulently obtaining a certificate of register, enrollment, or license, the statute cannot be liberally construed,[60] and a doubt as to whether the statute was applicable to the particular facts under consideration may properly be resolved against the United States.[61] The use of a vessel in an occupation not permitted by its registry does not warrant forfeiture of the vessel under the statute since such use of the vessel is not necessarily a fraudulent obtaining or use of a certificate of registry.[62]

The collector of a port has been held not to have abandoned the seizure of a vessel for fraudulent registry, notwithstanding delay in prosecuting the proceedings for forfeiture.[63]

(5) Prohibited Sale or Other Transfer of Vessel

Forfeiture may be proper, under some statutes, on failure to make known the sale or transfer, by way of trust, confidence, or otherwise, of a registered vessel to a foreigner; and transfer of a licensed vessel to an alien may be ground for forfeiture of the vessel and of the cargo found on board at the time of seizure.

In accordance with statute, failure to make known the sale or transfer, by way of trust, confidence, or otherwise, of a registered vessel to a foreigner is a ground for forfeiture.[64] It is not necessary that there should be a beneficial or bona fide sale in order to render the statute applicable.[65] So a sale on credit, with a provision for reclamation of the property in case of nonpayment, is a sale within the meaning of the statute,[66] as is a sale to a corporation existing under, and by virtue of, the laws of a foreign country,[67] especially if some of the stockholders are subjects of such foreign country.[68] This statute does not apply, however, to the sale of an enrolled or licensed vessel,[69] or, it has been held, to a vessel originally enrolled under the statute applicable to vessels engaged in trade on the northern, northeastern, or northwestern frontiers of the United States, where she had lost her status as a licensed vessel by reason of her previous sale.[70]

The saving clause of such statute, protecting from forfeiture the interest of a citizen of the United States who was ignorant of the sale or transfer to an alien, applies only to a part owner, and not to a sole owner.[71] So also, in order to entitle a person to the protection of this saving clause, he must be a part owner at the time of the commission of the act on which the forfeiture is founded.[72]

Sale of licensed vessel to alien. Forfeiture has been provided for the transfer of a licensed vessel to an alien,[73] whether or not there was a formal delivery of the vessel to the transferee;[74] and under the statute the cargo found on board at the time of seizure is also subject to forfeiture.[75] The statute applies to the sale of a licensed vessel, although because of such sale the license is no longer in force.[76] The statute does not apply, however, to the sale or transfer of an interest in a vessel which is not licensed,[77] such as an enrolled but unlicensed vessel.[78] So, it has been held, the statute does not apply to the sale of a vessel whose license has become void by reason of a previous sale so that she is no longer a licensed and enrolled vessel[79]

Failure to obtain approval of shipping board The phrase "documented under the laws of the United States," as used in the statutory provision for a forfeiture for selling a vessel "documented under the laws of the United States" to an alien without the approval of the shipping board, means "registered, enrolled, or licensed under the laws of the United States."[80] A vessel sold to the United States for use by the United States navy is not a "documented vessel of the United States" within the meaning of such statute,[81] and it has been held that, where such vessel is sold to a citizen by the secretary of the navy, pursuant to statutory authority, a subsequent sale by such citizen to an alien without the consent of the shipping board does not render the vessel subject to forfeiture.[82] So also, the statute requiring the approval of the shipping board does not apply so as to render subject to forfeiture, for failure to obtain such approval, a vessel sold to an alien under admiralty process in the court of a foreign country.[83]

(6) Unauthorized or Unlicensed Trade or Use

(a) In general

(b) What constitutes "trade"

(c) Illegal or prohibited trade

(a) In General

Employment of a vessel in a trade other than that for which she is licensed may render the vessel and her cargo subject to forfeiture regardless of innocence or want of knowledge of the owner of her unauthorized employment. In determining whether a vessel is engaging in unauthorized or unlicensed trade or use, the intention at the inception of a voyage determines its character.

Forfeiture may be had, in accordance with the statute, for employing a vessel in a trade other than that for which she is licensed.[84] A provision to this effect, being unambiguous, should not be extended by construction,[85] and, being highly penal, it must be strictly construed[86] The applicability of this statute has been recognized or upheld in the case of a vessel licensed for the coastwise trade,[87] for the fisheries,[88] for party and work,[89] and as a pleasure boat;[90] and by specific provision of another statute, in the case of a vessel licensed as a pleasure yacht, forfeiture may be had where such yacht transports merchandise for pay.[91]

In determining whether a vessel is engaging in unauthorized or unlicensed trade or use, the intention at the inception of a voyage determines its character and it is not necessary that the voyage should be completed before an offense denounced by the statute is committed so as to subject the vessel to forfeiture.[92] Innocence[93] or want of knowledge[94] on the part of the owner is not a defense in a proceeding for forfeiture. Necessity for violation of the law, if ever a defense, must be urgent.[95] The statute does not apply to a vessel which has only a number and is unlicensed,[96] and it does not apply to a vessel which has surrendered her license and has subsequently been sold under admiralty process in the courts of a foreign country.[97]

Forfeiture of cargo. While under the terms of the statute the forfeiture may include the cargo found on the forfeited vessel,[98] the statute exempts the cargo from forfeiture, where it belongs to persons other than the master, owner, or mariners on the vessel.[99] Such exemption has no application where the duties have not been paid or secured[1] or where the owners of the cargo participated in the vessel's unlawful trade.[2]

Trading without enrollment or license. The statute providing for forfeiture if certain vessels, not licensed or enrolled, have on board any article of foreign growth or manufacture, other than sea stores, applies only to vessels engaged in domestic trade,[3] and does not apply to a vessel licensed for the fisheries.[4]

(b) What Constitutes "Trade"

The term "trade" as used in the statute providing for forfeiture of a vessel employed in a trade other than that for which she is licensed is equivalent to "occupation," "employment," or "business."

The term "trade" as used in the statute providing for forfeiture of a vessel employed in a trade other than that for which she is licensed is equivalent to "occupation," "employment," or "business,"[5] or, according to some cases, to "occupation," "employment," or "activity,"[6] for gain or profit.[7] While it has been held that "trade" within the statute implies a regular occupation and not a temporary turning aside from some other trade,[8] it has also been held that a single act of unauthorized or unlicensed trade may work a forfeiture under the statute,[9] although the vessel continues her licensed business,[10] and that the statute may apply even though the vessel is not exclusively employed in the unauthorized trade.[11] The coasting trade,[12] mackerel fisheries,[13] and cod fisheries[14] are each a "trade" within the meaning of the statute; and it has been held that a vessel licensed for the cod fishery is not authorized, by her license, to engage in the mackerel fishery.[15] It seems, however, that a vessel licensed for the cod fishery is not subject to forfeiture for catching mackerel as a mere incident and not as one of the main objects of her pursuit.[16]

(c) Illegal or Prohibited Trade

The statute providing for forfeiture of a vessel for engaging in trade other than that for which it is licensed applies where a vessel, otherwise within the statute, is engaged in an illegal or prohibited trade.

The statute providing for forfeiture of a vessel for engaging in trade other than that for which it is licensed applies where a vessel, otherwise within the statute, is engaged in an illegal or prohibited trade,[17] as in the case of a vessel licensed for the coastwise trade,[18] or a vessel licensed for the fisheries.[19] The statute may apply to a vessel carrying goods on which no tax has been paid in violation of the internal revenue laws,[20] and the forfeiture proceeding need not be brought under another statute governing violations of the internal revenue laws.[21] In like manner the statute has been applied or recognized in respect of vessels engaged in the violation of the federal prohibition laws,[22] and it was held that forfeiture might be had under the statute here under consideration and that the government was not obliged to proceed to forfeit under the National Prohibition Act;[23] since repeal of the prohibition amendment a vessel licensed to engage in the coasting trade is not subject to forfeiture for carrying intoxicating liquors, since the license entitles the vessel to carry any lawful merchandise in such trade.[24]

(7) Importation or Coastwise Transportation of Goods on Other than Vessels of United States

Statutory provisions for forfeiture of a vessel for violation of a provision for importation of goods in vessels of the United States or in vessels of the country of origin of the goods have been construed and given effect. The cargo of a vessel may be subject to forfeiture for violation of a statute prohibiting the transportation of merchandise by water between points in the United States in other than vessels built in and documented under the laws of the United States.

Provision has been made for the forfeiture of vessels and their cargo for violation of the statutory provision for importation of goods, wares, or merchandise in vessels of the United States or in vessels of the country of which such goods, wares, or merchandise are the growth, production, or manufacture, or from which such goods, wares, or merchandise can only be, or most usually are, first shipped for transportation, with the exemption of vessels of a foreign nation which does not maintain a similar regulation against the United States and of a vessel owned by the citizens of the United States but not "a vessel of the United States;" and such statute, or an earlier provision of a similar nature, has been construed and given effect.[25] Goods shipped from one to another port of the United States are not imported within the meaning of such a statute, although the vessel makes an intermediate stop at a foreign port for passengers and freight.[26] The benefit of the exemption as to vessels of a foreign nation which does not maintain a similar regulation may not, of course, be claimed for a vessel which may not be regarded as a vessel of such a foreign nation [27]

The cargo of a vessel may be subject to forfeiture for violation of a statute prohibiting transportation of merchandise, by water, between points in the United States in vessels other than vessels built in and documented under the laws of the United States and owned by United States citizens.[28]

(8) Violation of Espionage Act

Under provisions of the Espionage Act, it may be a proper ground for forfeiture of a vessel that the owner or person in command has, within territorial waters, willfully caused or permitted the destruction or injury of the vessel, or knowingly permitted the vessel to be used as a place of resort for persons conspiring or preparing to commit an offense against the United States.

Under provisions of the Espionage Act, it may be a proper ground for forfeiture of a vessel that the owner, master, or other person in command has, within territorial waters of the United States, willfully caused or permitted the destruction or injury of the vessel,[29] or has knowingly permitted the vessel to be used as a place of resort for persons conspiring or preparing to commit an offense against the United States.[30] There is no con-

Shipment in part over rail route
Merchandise shipped on vessel operated in coastwise trade between ports within United States by corporation which was not citizen of United States within meaning of statute, where movement of merchandise over part of through route of Canadian railroad began in Vermont and ended in New York, and did not move over through route that was in part over Canadian rail lines and their own or other connecting water facilities, was held subject to forfeiture.—Central Vermont Transp. flict between the statute prescribing forfeiture for sabotage of a vessel and another statute authorizing the requisition of use of certain foreign vessels,[31] but they should be construed together so as to carry out the intent of congress.[32] In a libel by the government to forfeit a foreign vessel because of sabotage by its officers and crew, the court's jurisdiction of the vessel remains even if it should lose possession of the vessel without its consent,[33] and hence jurisdiction of the vessel is not relinquished by the granting of the government's motion for an order directing compliance with a notice of taking issued by the Maritime Commission under a statute authorizing the requisition of an idle foreign merchant vessel for the purposes of national defense.[34] Such requisition is not an abandonment of the government's proceeding to forfeit the vessel since the forfeiture proceeding deals with ownership and title, and the requisition only with possession and use.[35] While the claimant's right to compensation on requisition of the vessel should be fully protected, the admiralty court in which the forfeiture proceeding is pending may not determine such right.[36]

c. When Forfeiture Occurs; Rights of Third Persons

Where absolute forfeiture of a vessel is provided for by law, title of the government dates from the time the act aimed at is committed, and all rights or claims to the vessel arising thereafter, such as by a sale of the vessel to an innocent purchaser, are cut off. Except as otherwise provided by statute, forfeiture likewise cuts off such preëxisting interests in the vessel as that of a conditional vendor or mortgage lienholder, but a maritime lien for labor and supplies may be enforced notwithstanding the forfeiture.

Where absolute forfeiture of a vessel is provided for by law, title in the United States dates from the time the act aimed at is committed[37] In other words, while judgment of forfeiture is necessary to effectuate the title of the government, when it is declared, title dates back, by relation, to the time of commission of the prohibited act,[38] forfeiture does not depend on seizure, and the doing of the forbidden act itself effects forfeiture[39] It follows that all rights or claims to the vessel arising after the commission of the act warranting forfeiture, although acquired in good faith, are cut off,[40] and the forfeiture is not defeated by a sale of the vessel after the right to forfeiture arises, however innocent the purchaser may be[41] On the

(1) Act of captain, officers, and crew of Italian vessel which had been attached by a United States marshal in destroying machinery and equipment of vessel pursuant to agreement among themselves on eve of war between United States and Italy was a "use" of the vessel as a "place of resort" for a conspiracy against the United States within Espionage Act, justifying forfeiture of vessel.—The Leme, D C Or, 77 F Supp. 773

(2) It has been held, on the other hand, that the statute refers to permission to outsiders and not to the crew of the ship, and that Italian masters who allowed Italian Naval Attaché to come on the ships and permitted the crews to destroy the motive power did not thus permit the vessels to be used as a "place of resort" for conspiracy and preparation to commit an offense against the United States—The Pietro Campanella, D.C Md., 73 F Supp. 18.

A "place of resort" within the statute respecting commission of offense against the United States is not the same as a place of abode and the idea of a place of resort connotes frequent or repetitive visits to the place, and one's residence or home cannot fairly be classed as a place of resort by the owner or resident—The Pietro Campanella, supra.

Enemy alien

In proceeding for forfeiture of Italian vessel because of willful and wrongful damage to vessel by its officers and crew, claimant, which was an enemy alien, was not entitled to payment of any compensation for use of vessel by the Maritime Commission which had requisitioned vessel under statute for purposes of national defense, since an enemy alien may defend against a proceeding for forfeiture but may not sue either directly or indirectly for compensation —The Villarperosa, supra.

other hand, if the forfeiture is alternative, property or its value, the title does not vest until the election is made;[42] meanwhile an innocent purchaser may acquire a title not subject to forfeiture by subsequent seizure.[43]

In this connection, in construing forfeiture statutes which contain no alternative provision, it is generally recognized or held that, where the statute uses the words "shall be forfeited" or the like, the forfeiture is absolute and takes effect at the time the act aimed at is committed.[44] On the other hand, it has been said that there is a conflict of authority where the words used are "shall be liable to forfeiture."[45] In some cases it has been held that in such case forfeiture is not absolute,[46] that the forfeiture dates from the seizure,[47] and that the rights of innocent purchasers for value prior to seizure are protected;[48] but the contrary view has also been taken.[49]

Except as otherwise provided by the statute, a vessel may be forfeited to the government as against such preëxisting interests in the vessel as that of a conditional vendor[50] or mortgage lienholder,[51] even though they are innocent with respect to knowledge of, or participation in, the violations of law giving rise to the forfeiture; but under a provision of the Ship Mortgage Act that the mortgagee's interest in the vessel shall not be terminated by forfeiture of the vessel for violation of law, where the mortgagee had no knowledge thereof and did not participate therein, the interest of a mortgagee within the terms of the act prevails as against the right of forfeiture, and such rule is applicable not only to preferred ship mortgages, but also to a mortgage on a vessel under two hundred tons, which could not be preferred.[52] Also, notwithstanding forfeiture of a vessel for violation of certain statutes, a maritime lien for labor and supplies furnished the vessel before the violation may be enforced,[53] and the holder of such a lien who did not knowingly participate in the illegal acts is entitled to recover the principal sum of his claim, but not costs or counsel fees.[54] Where a decree forfeited a vessel for violation of the National Prohibition Act, although the libel was based on the statutory provisions for forfeiture for employment in a trade other than that for which the vessel was licensed, an innocent lienor was held entitled to the rights reserved by the prohibition act.[55]

Identical procedure and disposition

Provision of Shipping Act that all forfeitures incurred thereunder may be "prosecuted" in the same court

Under such provision, reference is to be had to the Customs Act for both the method of prosecution and the method of disposition of the forfeiture proceeding.[57] In the absence of statutory provision for a lien, a statute imposing a penalty against vessels or their owners for the violation of shipping regulations does not give the United States a lien therefor.[58]

Who may sue; parties. Penalties incurred by a vessel for violation of the navigation rules applicable to certain inland waters are recoverable by action brought by the United States, although the offense may have been committed on waters within a district having jurisdiction to prescribe local rules.[59] A suit against a master for failure to deposit the register of his vessel with the consul or vice consul of the United States in a foreign port should be brought in the name of the consul or vice consul for the benefit of the United States.[60]

An admiralty court has power to bring into the proceeding all parties claiming an interest in the vessel and adjudicate their claims.[61] According to some authority, in a libel to forfeit a vessel for willful damage thereto contrary to statute, the alien property custodian claiming title to any rights or interests of the owners will not be substituted for the owners as claimant, because it would leave no "adverse interests" before the court, but the alien property custodian may be made a party with the right to receive any interest in the vessels that the claimants had at the time of the order vesting their interests in the alien property custodian.[62] It has also been held, however, that under such circumstances the custodian is entitled to be substituted as a party to the forfeiture proceeding in place of claimant, since by the custodian's order claimant was denuded of all interest in the vessel.[63]

Time to sue Under a provision that forfeitures under the Shipping Act shall be prosecuted and disposed of in the same manner as provided in the Customs Act, the applicable period of limitation is that provided in the Customs Act rather than that provided by the general limitation act which is applicable except in cases where it is otherwise "specially" provided.[64] An earlier statute of limitations has been construed and applied.[65]

(3) Libels in words of applicable statute, clearly alleging that owner, master, or other person in charge or command of vessel willfully caused or permitted destruction of vessel and permitted vessel to be used as a place or resort for persons conspiring or preparing to commit offenses against the United States, sufficiently pleaded cause of forfeiture and gave district courts jurisdiction, where libels gave name which was registered under Italian law, libels were not insufficient for failure to allege that vessels were privately owned —U S v. The Antoinetta, C C.A N.J & Pa., 153 F.2d 138, certiorari denied Lorenzo v U. S, 66 S Ct 1368, 328 U S. 863, 90 L Ed 1633, and Rosasco v U. likewise, apply in proceedings for penalties.[67] No unusual particularity is required in the allegations of a libel for forfeiture,[68] so that the failure to allege the particular law violated in carrying on an illegal trade outside the license of the vessel proceeded against is not fatal.[69] Where it is charged that an intentionally false oath was made to obtain registration which suppressed the coownership of others in the vessel, the failure to name the coowners in the libel is excused by an allegation that the names and addresses thereof were unknown to libelant.[70] The provision in the statute relative to forfeiture for the failure to make known the transfer of a registered vessel to a foreigner, exempting the interest of a part owner who was ignorant of the transfer, need not be noticed in the libel;[71] the person who seeks the benefit of it should assert it in his claim as a matter of defense.[72] So, one claiming exemption from forfeiture of cargo seized on board a vessel engaged in a trade other than that for which licensed must plead by way of answer facts showing ground for exemption.[73]

Amendment. In a proceeding to forfeit a vessel for employment in a trade other than that for which licensed, the right of the government to amend the libel,[74] by inserting necessary averments of fact even after evidence has been offered,[75] has been recognized. An application to amend a libel for a penalty for an alleged failure to obtain a bill of health before clearing for a port in the United States made after the conclusion of arguments, has, however, been denied, where the violation charged was at most technical and had not in any way endangered health at the ports of the United States.[76]

(3) Evidence

Generally, the burden of proving facts entitling the United States to forfeiture is on the United States, but in suits for forfeiture because of employment in a trade other than that for which the vessel was licensed, on the due showing of probable cause for seizure, the burden of proof is on claimant of the vessel in question General rules as to admissibility and weight and sufficiency of evidence apply.

In general the burden of proving facts entitling the United States to forfeiture is on the United States.[77] While it has been laid down in general terms that, in a suit for forfeiture because of the employment of the vessel in a trade other than that for which licensed, the burden of proving that the vessel was engaged in carrying cargo in violation of her license is on the United States,[78] in view of the statutory provision that penalties and forfeitures which shall be incurred by virtue of the chapter relative to certain penalties and forfeitures, affecting enrolled or licensed vessels, shall be sued for, prosecuted, and incurred by virtue of the laws relating to the collection of duties, and the statutory provision as to the burden of proof in suits or actions for the forfeiture of vessels or merchandise seized under the provision of any law relating to the collection of duties on imports, the view has been taken, in suits for forfeiture because of employment in a trade other than that for which the vessel was licensed,[79] or because of use of a certificate of registration to which the vessel was not entitled,[80] that, on due showing of probable cause for seizure, the burden of proof is on claimant of the vessel in question.

proceeding for forfeiture of a vessel licensed for the fisheries for carrying merchandise from a foreign port, the importation is admitted or proved, the burden rests on claimant to establish his innocence.[81] The burden is on the person contending for a restricted meaning of the language of a penal statute to show some ground for the conclusion that the statute should not be construed in accordance with the terms used.[82]

Admissibility. In general, any evidence which is material and relevant is admissible;[83] otherwise it is not.[84] So, in general, any credible evidence, on behalf of the government, tending to show that the vessel charged was engaged in an unlawful trade is, in general, admissible in a proceeding to forfeit under the statute providing for forfeiture for engaging in trade other than that for which it was licensed.[85]

Weight and sufficiency. General rules as to the weight and sufficiency of evidence apply in proceedings for penalties[86] or forfeitures,[87] as for engaging in a trade other than that for which the vessel was licensed,[88] or for fraudulently obtaining or using registry for a vessel not entitled to the benefit thereof.[89] The weight to be given to the evidence is for the court to consider.[90] While in an early case in the supreme court it was laid down that the United States must prove a violation of the law as a ground for forfeiture beyond a reasonable doubt,[91] the view has been taken that, in a suit for forfeiture for engaging in a trade other than that for which the vessel was licensed, the United States is required to prove the allegations of the libel only by a preponderance of evidence,[92] and not beyond a reasonable doubt as in a criminal case,[93] and, where claimant fails to introduce any evidence, the government is required only to show probable cause for instituting the forfeiture proceeding.[94]

Even where the burden of proof is on claimant of the vessel in a suit for forfeiture for engaging in a trade other than that for which it was licensed, and a showing of cause for seizure has been made, claimant's proof, although not convincing, may render forfeiture unwarranted.[95] In a suit for forfeiture because of employment of a vessel in a trade other than that for which it was licensed, to support the defense of necessity for violation of law, the proof must be clear[96] Where, under the evidence, only two conclusions of fact may be drawn, either of which shows that the vessel was employed in a trade other than that for which she was licensed, it is sufficient to sustain the case of the government[97]

(4) Decree, Review, and Costs

On review of a decree in forfeiture proceedings, the trial court's findings ordinarily are entitled to great weight.

Decree for forfeiture of a pleasure yacht for transporting merchandise for pay is not subject to complaint because of an order for delivery at a certain place.[98]

Review. In accordance with the general rule in admiralty proceedings, the trial court's findings ordinarily are entitled to great weight,[99] and findings in a forfeiture proceeding, by a special master, approved by the trial court, will not be set aside or reversed on appeal except for manifest error given to the consideration of the evidence or in the application of the law.[1] Claimant appealing from a decree forfeiting a vessel and its cargo cannot complain of the admission of evidence admissible against the vessel but not against the cargo, where proper objections were not raised at the trial.[2]

Costs The statute authorizing the court to give a certificate of probable cause for the seizure, which will prevent an award of costs to claimant, has been given effect in a proceeding for forfeiture.[3] In a case in which probable cause for the seizure appeared, the costs have been divided between the United States and claimant[4] The allowance of fees to the attorney representing claimant of the vessel sought to be forfeited has in particular circumstances been denied[5]

e. Remission or Restoration and Protection of Owners or Lienors

Under the statutes, power to remit or mitigate penalties or forfeitures imposed under the federal statutes relating thereto is vested in the designated officer, and the court has no power to revise the decision of the officer or to inquire into the grounds on which it was made. If the remission of a forfeiture is made subject to certain conditions within the power of the remitting authority to impose, such conditions must be complied with.

Under the statutes, application may be made to a designated executive officer for remission or mitigation of penalties or forfeitures imposed under the federal statutes here under consideration.[6] The power of remission or mitigation belongs exclusively to the designated officer,[7] and the fact that a libel or information has been filed to enforce the penalty or forfeiture,[8] or that a decree has been entered by the court,[9] is immaterial; and an application for remission does not require the court to postpone the trial.[10] In such case the court has no power to revise the decision of the officer or to inquire into the grounds on which it was made,[11] at least in the absence of any showing that the action of the officer was illegal and beyond his power;[12] and, where a vessel has lawfully been forfeited, a court has no jurisdiction to entertain proceedings for restoration.[13]

Conditions precedent. If the remission of a forfeiture is made subject to certain conditions, which the authorized officer has power to impose, such conditions must be complied with.[14]

Effect of remission. If a remission of a forfeiture is granted before a libel or information is filed, such remission operates directly to revest the right of property and possession in the petitioner for remission,[15] and the collector in possession is bound to restore the property on such petitioner's presentation of the warrant of remission.[16] After the filing of a libel or information, however, the property is in the custody of the court, and the collector may not restore it without an order of court.[17]

Revocation. The authorized officer has the power, after a remission of a forfeiture has been granted and communicated to claimant, to revoke the warrant,[18] unless the remission is conditional and the condition has been performed without knowledge of the revocation.[19]

Relief in equity. The right of persons against whom penalties have been imposed by executive officers to appeal to a court of equity to prevent the enforcement of such penalties has been recognized.[20]

Protection of lienor. Where an innocent lienor was entitled to avail himself of the protection of the National Prohibition Act in a case in which, although the vessel was libeled because of engaging in a trade other than that for which she was licensed, she was condemned under the Prohibition Act, such lienor was held not barred by laches from the right to vacate forfeiture, where he proceeded with due diligence after notice of the seizure.[21] In a libel by the government for forfeiture of alcohol for violation of the navigation law, where the court of appeals ordered the sale of the alcohol free of any tax lien and the proceeds paid into the court registry pending outcome of the proceedings, it was proper for the government to petition the court sitting in admiralty for application of the proceeds toward satisfaction of the tax due on the alcohol.[22] The right to cut off the interest of a lienor by forfeiture of the vessel is discussed supra subdivision c of this section.

Showing as to ownership. A claimant of property, seized on board a vessel condemned for engaging in a trade other than that for which licensed, is not entitled to restoration unless he shows good title to such property.[23]

Motorboat Act
(1) Federal district court had jurisdiction of prosecution for violation of Motorboat Act, if waters of Lake Tahoe where offense was alleged to have been committed were navigable waters of the United States notwith-

in a vessel is not punishable for any crime committed by one acting as her agent in procuring the enrollment and license of the vessel unless the equitable owner has participated in the agent's acts.[25] In a criminal prosecution for an offense against the navigation laws, the registry of a vessel is no evidence of ownership by a citizen of the United States.[26] The fact of ownership must be proved as any other fact by witnesses whom defendant may cross-examine.[27]

Navigating steam vessel without, or failure to employ, licensed engineer. Violations of the statutory provision that small craft, propelled by steam, which provision was extended to include craft of over fifteen tons burden operated for hire, propelled by gas, fluid, naphtha, or electric motors, shall not be navigated without a licensed engineer,[28] and the statutory provision that it shall be unlawful to employ any person as an engineer who is not licensed by the inspectors,[29] have been regarded as offenses punishable by indictment. Under the last mentioned statute knowledge on the part of the owner that the engineer was not licensed is unnecessary.[30]

Operating water craft without use of muffler or exhaust. Various state statutes have made the operation of certain water craft without a muffler or underwater exhaust an offense.[31] Under certain of these statutes the mere equipment of the craft with a muffler or underwater exhaust is not sufficient to avoid liability,[32] and, even though the craft is properly equipped in this respect, a failure to use the muffler may constitute the offense.[33]

b. Boarding Vessel without Consent of Master

It is made an offense by statute for any person not being in the United States service, and not being duly authorized by law, to go on board a vessel about to arrive at her place of destination before her actual arrival, and without the permission of the master.

It is made an offense by federal statute for any person not being in the United States service, and not being duly authorized by law, to go on board a vessel about to arrive at her place of destination before her actual arrival, without the permission of the master.[34] This statute is intended to protect foreign vessels as well as vessels of the United States.[35] The offense may be committed, although at the time of the boarding the vessel was temporarily at anchor in the harbor.[36] Climbing on the rail of the vessel without permission is within the prohibition of the statute.[37] Under a similar state statute the view was taken that the offense was complete on the offender's boarding the vessel without having obtained the leave which the statute required, and without regard to his motive and to the fact that permission was afterward given him by the captain to remain on board.[38]

Prosecution and punishment. The government need not prove that accused was not in the United States service or that he was not duly authorized by law to board the vessel.[39] In the absence of evidence showing permission by the master, proof that the master was not on board and that the mate in command did not give permission is sufficient to support a conviction where the other elements of the offense are present.[40] The punishment is fixed by the statute.[41]

(1) In General

Under a statute so providing it is an offense for a person not being an owner willfully and corruptly to cast away or otherwise destroy any vessel to which he belongs, or willfully, with intent to destroy it, to set fire to such vessel, or otherwise attempt the destruction thereof.

Under a statute so providing, it is an offense for a person not being an owner willfully and corruptly to cast away or otherwise destroy any vessel to which he belongs, or willfully, with intent to destroy it, to set fire to any such vessel, or otherwise attempt the destruction thereof.[42] The act must be done willfully and feloniously.[43] While under the terms of the existing statute the offense may be committed on the high seas or on any other waters within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States, formerly the statute required that the offense must be committed on the high seas.[44] The destruction of vessels on waters not within the maritime jurisdiction of the United States was made an offense by certain early state statutes.[45]

Acts included. The terms "destroy" and "cast away," as used in the federal statute, have received judicial construction.[46]

Persons liable and directions of owner. The act aimed at by the federal statute must be performed by a person not an owner,[47] and an owner incurs no penalty by casting away the vessel, or by directing others to do it, unless he intends to prejudice an insurer of the vessel or merchant having goods thereon or any other owner of the vessel.[48] However, the fact that the owner is on board and authorizes or commands the destruction of the vessel is not a defense to an indictment against the master for willfully destroying the vessel with intent to defraud the underwriters.[49] A minor who ships without the knowledge of his parents may be convicted under the statute.[50]

Prosecution. In prosecutions under the federal statutes, general rules as to indictments apply,[51] as do general rules as to the admissibility[52] or sufficiency[53] of evidence in criminal cases.

(2) Under Espionage Act

Under the Espionage Act, a portion of which constituted war legislation, and the remainder of which was adopted as an ordinary criminal statute applicable without regard to any state of national emergency, it is an offense, among other acts, for any person to tamper with the motive power or instrumentalities of navigation of certain vessels with intent to injure or endanger the safety of the vessels or of persons on board, and it is another independent offense for an owner, master, or member of the crew, without regard to intent, to injure or destroy a vessel within the territorial waters of the United States.

Certain offenses with respect to the injury or destruction of vessels have been denounced by the Espionage Act, later incorporated in the federal criminal code as 18 U.S.C.A. §§ 5, 2275, and 50 U.S.C.A. § 193,[54] a portion of which constituted war legislation, and the remainder of which was adopted as an ordinary criminal statute applicable without regard to any state of national emergency.[55] Under one portion of the statute, which has been held valid,[56] it is an offense, among other acts, for any

Design of statute

The statute entitled "An Act To punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes," was designed to protect the foreign commerce of the country and vessels usable as instrumentalities of that commerce, as well as to punish espionage and other crimes particularly harmful to the country in time of war.—Bersio v. U. S., C.C.A.N.C., 124 F.2d 310, certiorari denied Bersia v. U. S., 62 S.Ct. 1033, 316 U.S. 665, 86 L.Ed. 1742—Pieraccini v. U. Crime against United States

The crime of injuring a vessel of foreign registry while within the jurisdiction of the United Sates is a crime against the United States which includes the Canal Zone.—U. S. ex rel. McDermott v. Jaeger, C.C.A.N.Y., 126 F.2d 1002, dismissing appeal 39 F.Supp. 307, certiorari denied 62 S.Ct. 1269, 316 U.S. 680, 86 L.Ed. 1754.

person to tamper with the motive power or instrumentalities of navigation of certain vessels with intent to injure or endanger the safety of the vessels or of persons on board,[57] and, under another portion of the statute, subsequently reënacted as 18 U.S.C.A. § 2274, it is unlawful for the owner, master, or member of the crew to injure or destroy a vessel within the territorial waters of the United States,[58] or to use the vessel as a place of resort of any person conspiring or preparing to commit any offense against the United States.[59] Although there is an overlapping of these two provisions, the two offenses are separate and distinct.[60]

Definiteness

The statute meets essential requirement of constitution that a penal statute must be sufficiently explicit to inform those who are subject to it what conduct on their part will render them liable to its penalties, and must be couched in terms that are not so vague that men of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning and differ as to its application —Bersio v U. S, C.C. A.N.C, 124 F 2d 310, certiorari denied Bersia v. U. S, 62 S Ct. 1033, 316 U.S. 665, 86 L Ed. 1742—Pieraccini v. U. Purpose

(1) The statute was enacted for the purpose of protecting all shipping engaged in commerce with foreign nations.—Polonio v. U. S, C.C.A. Or., 131 F 2d 679

(2) The purpose of statute was not to protect owners of vessels against malicious acts of others, but to protect vessels themselves, as instrumentalities usable in vital foreign commerce of the country from destruction or injury by any one.—Bersio v. U S, C C A N.C, 124 F 2d 310, certiorari denied Bersia v. U. S, 62 S.Ct 1033, 316 U S. 665, 86 L Ed 1742 —Pieraccini v U. Proclamation of emergency

(1) It has been held that such statute is applicable only after presidential proclamation of a national emergency.—Marchese v U S, C.C.A. Fla, Ga, La, Tex, 126 F 2d 671.

(2) It has also been held, however, that no such proclamation is required to render the statute effective, but that, even if required, certain presidential orders constituted a sufficient proclamation for this purpose —U S. v The Antoinetta, C.C A N J & Pa., 153 F 2d 138, certiorari denied Lorenzo v U S, 66 S.Ct. 1368, 328 U S 863, 90 L Ed 1633, and Rosasco v. Basis of distinction

The Espionage Act, Title II, penalizing willful injury to, or destruction of, vessel by owner, master, or member of crew thereof and Title III, penalizing acts done with intent to injure or endanger safety of vessel engaged in foreign commerce, are independent, and by Title II congress provided for protection of private vessels, foreign or domestic, during and after the declaration of a national emergency without regard to the specific intent and by Title III provided for protection for similar vessel even before a national emergency has been declared to exist, provided the forbidden act was done with the specific intent required.—Giugni v. U. S., C.C.A.Puerto Rico, 127 F.2d 786

Different situations

Congress, in enacting statute which makes it unlawful for any person to tamper with the motive power or instrumentalities of navigation of a vessel with intent to injure or endanger the safety of the vessel or of persons on board, was dealing with a different situation and one which it considered more reprehensible and dangerous than that covered by statute making it unlawful for owner or master or any other person in charge or command of any private vessel, foreign or domestic, within territorial waters of the United States, willfully to cause or permit the destruc-

ing with the motive power or instrumentalities of navigation of certain vessels by its terms applies to two classes of ships, namely, vessels of foreign registry in American ports, and vessels of American registry entitled to engage in commerce with foreign nations whether in American ports or on the high sea.[61] As to the vessels of foreign registry there is no limitation regarding whether they are engaged in or usable in foreign commerce,[62] and notwithstanding the catchline of the statute indicative of its application to vessels engaged in foreign commerce, a vessel of foreign registry which has come into a port of the United States for the purpose of carrying on foreign commerce with foreign countries is within the scope of the statute, even though it is not actively engaged in commerce at the time of commission of the prohibited acts.[63]

Under the provisions of the statute relating to "tampering" with certain vessels applicable to "whoever" commits the prohibited acts, persons who may be liable thereunder include owners, officers, members of the crew,[64] or anyone else who may be in control of the vessel,[65] and the statute is not restricted to outsiders.[66] So, the fact that defendant's acts of destruction or injury were performed with the consent of the owner of the vessel does not render the statute inapplicable, or constitute a defense.[67] The statute renders unlawful any sort of improper interference with the machinery of the vessel, if the acts done are accompanied by the requisite intent;[68] it is not necessary to prove that there was actual destruction or even a serious injury following the tampering, and the amount of the damage done is not material.[69]

The intent with which acts are committed is a material element of the statutory offense of injuring vessels engaged in foreign commerce, as by tampertion or injury of such vessel—U. S. v. Saglietto, D.C.Va., 41 F.Supp. 21

61. U.S.—Polonio v. U. S., C.C.A.Or., 131 F.2d 679

Availability for use

The act applies to all vessels available for use in foreign commerce, although not actively engaged therein, but tied up at wharves in United States ports at time of injuries thereto.—Marchese v. U. S., C.C.A.Fla., 126 F.2d 671.

62. U.S.—Giugni v. U. S., C.C.A.Puerto Rico, 127 F.2d 786.

Appropriateness of language used in statute

It was appropriate for congress to use the language "entitled to engage in commerce with foreign nations" only in limitation with the phrase "vessel of American registry" and leave the phrase "vessel of foreign registry" without limitation.—Giugni v. U. S., supra.

63. U.S.—Bersio v. U. S., C.C.A.N.C., 124 F.2d 310, certiorari denied Bersia v. U. S., 62 S.Ct. 1033, 316 U.S. 665, 86 L.Ed. 1742—Pieraccini v. U. Friend or enemy

Under statute, relating to destruction of, injury to, or improper use of, vessels, no owner, whether friend or enemy, may destroy his ship in an American port.—U. S. v. Martini, D.C.Ala., 42 F.Supp. 502.

Subjects of foreign country

Although officers and crew of Italian vessel were subject to orders of their own government, they must accept the consequences of violating the laws of the United States in executing orders of the Italian government to do such damage to vessel which was in American port as would prevent her from being used in any service that might be helpful to enemies of Italy.—U. S. v. Martini, supra.

66. U.S.—U. S. v. Tomicich, D.C.Pa., 41 F.Supp. 33, affirmed, C.C.A., 126 F.2d 1023.

Reference to owner and crew in another statute

Since the crime denounced by provision punishing whoever tampers with motive power or instrumentalities of navigation of a vessel engaged in foreign commerce is not the same as crime denounced by another provision prohibiting injury to, or destruction of, vessels in ports of the United States by owner, master, or crew member, the reference to owners and crew in latter provision does not limit the scope of the word "whoever" as used in former provision—Polonio v. U. S., C.C.A.Or., 131 F.2d 679.

"Tamper"

(1) In statute making it an offense to tamper with the motive power or instrumentalities of navigation of any vessel within jurisdiction of United States, the word "tamper" does not preclude the application of the statute to any person other than an outsider on the theory that tamper in its ordinary acceptance comprehends only acts of meddlesome interference by persons other than an owner or his agents—Giugni v. U. S., C.C.A.Puerto Rico, 127 F.2d 786—U. S. v. Tomicich, D.C.Pa., 41 F.Supp. 33, affirmed, C.C.A., 126 F.2d 1023

ing with the motive power or instrumentalities of navigation of the vessel,[70] but in a prosecution under the other provision of the statute relating to the destruction of, injury to, or improper use of, vessels, it is not necessary to allege and prove the intent with which the act is done.[71] The intent required to be shown under the former provision is the intent either to injure, or endanger the safety of, the vessel, her cargo, or of persons on board,[72] and, where the forbidden acts were performed with such intent, no further showing of malice or intent to commit a wrong is required to authorize a conviction.[73] It is not required to be shown that in damaging the machinery of a vessel defendant knew that he was violating a law of the United States since ignorance of the law is no excuse for its violation.[74]

Under the provision as to "tampering" with certain vessels, it is immaterial whether the injury or danger is intended to take place while the vessel is in a port of the United States or after it has departed therefrom,[75] or whether the vessel involved was or was not in operation at the time of the alleged violation,[76] and liability may not be avoided on the theory that, as the particular vessel was tied up in port, its safety was not injured by acts which merely immobilized its machinery, and that no intent to inflict such injury could be inferred from defendant's acts.[77] It has been held that the requisite intent to injure the vessel may be satisfied by a finding of intent to injure integral parts thereof, such as the main engines,[78] but it has also been held that the prohibited intent must go further than a mere intent to injure the machinery of the vessel itself,[79] and that the statute is not directed at injury to a vessel that might result merely in making it unable to move under its power, but rather to injury done with intent to endanger the entire safety of the vessel or to encompass its destruction as a whole or as a unit of navigation, when it was being used or was capable of being used at the time of the commission of the offense, for the transportation of men and goods to foreign countries.[80]

In prosecutions for violation of such statute, decisions have adjudicated questions as to the sufficiency of the indictment,[81] the sufficiency of the evidence to present a question for the jury,[82] or to sustain a conviction,[83] and the propriety of par-

Under statute making it unlawful for owner or master or any other person in charge or command of any private vessel, foreign or domestic, within territorial waters of United States, willfully to cause or permit destruction or injury of such vessel, any willful injury to the vessel, regardless of intended consequences, is prohibited, although the word "willfully" means knowingly and designedly and would necessarily require the act to be intentional and not an accidental happening—U. Right of seizure of vessel

The mere fact that vessel of Italian registry was tied up in port of United States, and, therefore, could have been seized under statute authorizing forfeitures of vessels for willful injury to them if it were proved that owner or master had done acts denounced in that statute, would not operate as a defense to criminal proceeding against officers and members of crew under statute making it an offense to tamper with motive power of vessel of foreign registry within jurisdiction of the United States—U. II. TITLE AND OWNERSHIP

Ships are personal property, and title thereto ordinarily is controlled by the general rules with respect to title to personal property.

Ships[86] and other vessels[87] constitute personal property, and except as far as modified by statute, matters of title with respect to ships are to be tested by the common-law rules governing title to personal property.[88]

Right to possession. A corporation set up to protect the rights of owners of a ship of foreign registry as existing prior to an invasion of the foreign country and the setting up in such country of a government not recognized by the United States will be accorded the right to possession of the ship as against others claiming through the unrecognized government.[89]

The validity of title to a ship is not dependent on its registry.[90]

§ 14. Title under Contract for Building Vessel

Ordinarily, under a contract for building an entire vessel, no property vests in the purchaser until completion and delivery, but this rule may be varied by the contract between the parties.

Under a contract for building an entire vessel, as a general rule no property vests in the person for whom she is built until she is ready for delivery and has been accepted or approved by such person,[91] at least as against third persons.[92] There is, however, no arbitrary rule of construction controlling such agreements, but the question is one of intent, open in every case to be determined on the terms of the contract and the circumstances attending the transaction.[93] If the parties expressly so agree, title to the vessel or materials, as far as completed and paid for during the progress of the work, will pass to the purchaser,[94] without the execution of a bill of sale or other writing,[95] and this rule is not affected by the fact that the purchaser, under other provisions of the contract, has the right to reject the vessel or parts thereof because of defects,[96] or to complete the vessel in the event of annulment of the contract,[97] or by the fact that the builder is required to give a bond for the faithful performance of his contract,[98] and is responsible for all liabilities for labor and material incurred in the prosecution of the work.[99] If the contract provides that the buyer shall have a lien on, and ownership in, the vessel as the building progresses up to the amount paid on the contract, the builder to keep the vessel protected by insurance against fire, making the policies payable to the buyer, the interest of the latter before delivery is not an absolute ownership but only an interest in the nature of a lien for the money advanced.[1]

Implied agreement as to passing of title. In the absence of an express agreement therefor, an agreement or intention that title to the unfinished vessel, or to material, shall pass to the purchaser at different stages of the work may be inferred from the language of the contract and the circumstances attending the transaction.[2] The prevailing rule in this country is that an intention that the property in the vessel shall vest in the purchaser at certain stages prior to final delivery will not be inferred from the mere fact that the purchase price of the vessel is to be paid in installments as the work progresses, and is so paid,[3] or from that fact and the further fact that the construction is to take place under the superintendence of an agent who is authorized to reject or approve any materials used in the construction or equipment of such vessel,[4] or that the builder executed a mortgage to secure his faithful performance, which mortgage is to be surrendered when the vessel is fully completed and accepted and the balance of the purchase price paid.[5] Some authorities in this country have, however, followed the English rule to the contrary to the effect that, except where the attendant circumstances point to a different conclusion, an intention or an agreement that at a particular stage in the construction of the vessel title thereto, as far as constructed, shall pass to the owner, will be inferred from a provision in the contract to the effect that an installment in the price shall be paid at such stage, coupled with the fact that such installment has been duly paid, and that the work has been regularly inspected by the purchaser or his agent.[6]

Where plaintiff seeks recovery in claim and detainer for a vessel built under a contract entitling him to ownership on proof that the earnings of the ship from operation after construction have been sufficient to pay off the money loaned by defendant, the courts will apply the usual rules in respect of evidence[7] and instructions,[8] and will compute net earnings under the contract in compliance with its provisions.[9]

§ 15. Evidence of Title

a. In general
b. Registry and enrollment
c. Bill of sale

a. In General

Under the general rules, which govern in respect of evidence of ownership of a vessel, the burden of proof rests on the party asserting title to the ship.

In accordance with general rules discussed in Property § 17, the burden of proving title to, or ownership of, a vessel is on the party who asserts that fact;[10] but, where a prima facie case of ownership is established, the burden is on the opposing party to show the contrary.[11]

Ordinarily it is not necessary to prove ownership by the register,[12] or by a bill of sale,[13] or other instrument in writing;[14] but parol evidence may be received for this purpose.[15] The register or other documentary evidence is necessary only where the asserted ownership is contradicted and the participant is called on to produce such documents.[16] While parol evidence has been held inadmissible to contradict the ship's papers with respect to ownership,[17] other decisions have held it admissible in contradiction of the register and bill of sale,[18] and it has been held to be the law that it may be shown by a parol agreement or transfer that title to a vessel is actually in one although the ship's documents on their face show it to be in another.[19] It has also been held that statutes providing that no bill of sale or mortgage of any vessel shall be valid unless recorded where the vessel is registered or enrolled is a mere registry act and does not preclude admission of parol evidence of the ownership of a vessel in an action by the purchaser for conversion of machinery taken therefrom.[20]

The general rules as to the weight and sufficiency of evidence apply to the weight and sufficiency of evidence to establish ownership of a vessel[21] or to constitute prima facie evidence of ownership.[22] A certificate of the collector of customs, that the ownership of a named vessel had been transferred and the transfer recorded, is not sufficient to show ownership in the transferee,[23] and resolutions of a corporate conditional buyer of a vessel and of its subsidiary, showing an intent to transfer it to the subsidiary in the future, is insufficient to show that the subsidiary was a beneficial owner.[24]

Actual possession and control by the party in whom the interest is alleged to be, and acts of ownership by him, are in cases of vessels, as with other personal property, presumptive evidence of title.[25] On the other hand, possession and operation of a vessel by a subsidiary of a corporation to which it was conditionally sold is insufficient to prove that the subsidiary was the assignee of the parent corporation.[26]

A sea letter is a certificate of ownership granted unregistered vessels belonging to citizens of the United States.[27]

b. Registry and Enrollment

(1) Registry
(2) Enrollment

(1) Registry

The registry of a ship is neither the exclusive nor conclusive evidence of title, but is a circumstance for consideration in determining her ownership.

The registry of a vessel regulates only its national character, as discussed supra § 3, and is not regarded as a document of title or in itself necessarily evidence thereof.[28] While the register indicates record ownership,[29] and is a circumstance to be considered in the ascertainment of actual possession and control,[30] and, in case of loss of other papers, may be admissible as best evidence,[31] it is not the sole or exclusive evidence of the ownership of a vessel.[32] Unless the register is made evidence by statute, it furnishes evidence of ownership, as against the person sought to be charged as owner, only when it is confirmed by some auxiliary circumstance showing that it was made on the oath of such person or by his authority or consent.[33] Without such connecting proof the register has been held not to be even prima facie evidence to charge a person as owner;[34] and even with such proof it is prima facie evidence only, and not conclusive evidence of ownership;[35] since an equitable title in one person may well consist with the documentary title, at the customhouse, in another.[36] Accordingly it has been held that the person in whose name a vessel is registered and to whom is issued a certificate of ownership is presumed to have the legal title thereto,[37] and that this presumption is not overcome by proof that another person exercised acts of ownership over the vessel.[38] In favor of the person claiming as owner, the registry is no evidence at all, since it is nothing more than his declaration.[39]

Incidental question. Where the question of ownership is merely incidental, the registry alone may be deemed sufficient prima facie evidence.[40]

(2) Enrollment

A certificate of enrollment may afford some evidence of ownership of a vessel, but stands on no higher footing than the registry.

A certificate of enrollment of a vessel pursuant to a federal statute is some evidence of ownership;[41] but the enrollment is not evidence of a higher nature than a registry.[42] It is not admissible, as evidence of property either in favor of or against persons named therein as part owners, who were not instrumental in procuring it to be made, and who have neither authorized nor assented to it.[43] Without such connecting proof, the enrollment has been held not to be even prima facie evidence to charge a person as owner,[44] and even with such proof it is not conclusive evidence of ownership,[45] but is prima facie evidence thereof,[46] and is sufficient in the absence of opposing proof.[47]

c. Bill of Sale

A bill of sale is the usual evidence by which title to a vessel is shown.

A bill of sale is the customary document by which the ownership of vessels is evidenced,[48] and therefore is competent evidence of title in the purchaser,[49] and when accompanied by possession is prima facie evidence of title or ownership,[50] but is not conclusive.[51] A bill of sale has been held not admissible as evidence of title where it is not recorded as required by statute.[52]

Coowners of a ship ordinarily hold as tenants in common.

As a general rule, where there is no other relation between part owners of a vessel than that arising out of joint ownership, they hold their respective interests therein as tenants in common,[53] and, in the absence of a statute so providing, they do not hold as joint tenants.[54]

As partners. The several owners of a merchant vessel or steamboat ordinarily do not hold their respective interests therein as copartners,[55] although the relationship between them is analogous to that of a partnership.[56] A vessel or boat, however, like any other chattel, may be held by the part owners in actual partnership.[57] The fact of such partnership relation may arise either out of a special agreement by which the part owners constitute themselves partners,[58] as where it is built under a special agreement, whereby one of the owners is to be master and the other to be ship's husband, and the vessel is to be employed on joint account as a regular packet between certain stations;[59] or it may be implied from the circumstances of the particular case,[60] as from the nature and character of the business or adventure in which the owners are engaged,[61] or from the fact that partnership funds have been invested in the purchase of the vessel.[62] Since such a partnership relation is regarded as being by way of exception to the usual relation of tenancy in common,[63] in order to be effective it must be clearly shown,[64] and has been held to arise only by special contract.[65] The owners do not become partners with one who advances them money, on their personal promise to pay him a share of the proceeds of the voyage in proportion to the sum advanced by him.[66]

Whatever the relation of the owners as to the title to the vessel, they may, if the elements of partnership are present, become partners in the use and employment of her in the business of carrying freight and passengers for hire,[67] which partnership necessarily terminates when the vessel is lost or sold,[68] or in case of a special partnership for a voyage, on the termination of the voyage;[69] and every change in the owners while the vessel is so engaged constitutes a new partnership.[70] Under such circumstances, however, in the absence of an express stipulation to the contrary, the use only, and not the property, of the vessel is brought into the partnership,[71] and the vessel itself does not thereby become partnership property but continues the property of the coöwners, as tenants in common;[72] and in some jurisdictions this rule is declared by statute.[73]

Evidence as to nature and extent of interest. Joint owners of a vessel are presumed to be owners of equal parts;[74] but the presumption is subject to rebuttal, as by evidence of insurance by each in different proportions,[75] or by the production of the books and papers of the vessel;[76] and parol evidence of their contents, unless specially objected to as secondary, must receive the same consideration as the books and papers themselves.[77] The registry of two or more persons as owners does not prevent them from showing that their respective shares are different from those appearing in the registry.[78]

Conclusive combination of circumstances

Where there was joint ownership of a vessel in specific shares, the setting aside of a portion of the gross receipts for labor and maintenance, the sharing of net profits and losses, and the operation of a transportation business for the mutual benefit of the owners with service held out incidentally as available to the public, there was clearly a partnership relation even though none of such circumstances by itself alone may have been sufficient to show a partnership. —Newman v Corbman, supra.

(2) Use and control of vessel
(3) Profits and expenses
(4) Loss of, or injury to, vessel or cargo
(5) Repairs and supplies

(1) In General

The rights and liabilities of coowners of a vessel generally are governed by the laws relating to tenancy in common, but where a partnership exists as between such coowners the laws relating to partnership will control.

The powers, rights, duties and liabilities of coowners of ships are in general essentially the same as in the case of other tenants in common in any other chattels,[79] and accordingly are generally determined and controlled by the laws relating to tenancy in common in general.[80] The power of one part owner as tenant in common to bind his coowner depends on the question of authority, which is generally a mere question of fact,[81] of which the fact of coownership is only prima facie evidence,[82] which may be rebutted by proof of the existence of any other fact wholly inconsistent with the existence of such authority.[83] Ordinarily an individual part owner has no power, merely by virtue of his relation as joint owner, to bind his coowners with respect to any matters beyond the necessary and regular use of the vessel.[84] Without their authority or consent he cannot sell the interest of his coowner, as discussed infra § 18, or mortgage it,[85] draw drafts or notes in the name of the vessel and owners,[86] apply the freight earned in payment of his individual debt,[87] or procure insurance for the other owners, as considered in Insurance § 219.

Where the relation between the several owners as to the ownership or operation of the vessel is that of partnership, the laws relating to partnership in general determine and control their rights and liabilities.[88] Each owner, as partner, may deal with the ship like any other chattel of the firm,[89] or he may sell the firm's interest, as discussed infra § 18, or mortgage it;[90] and the partners are bound in solido on all obligations growing out of the business of the partnership.[91]

(2) Use and Control of Vessel

As between coowners the right of control and use of the vessel ordinarily will be accorded to the majority in interest, provided, if required, they give security for the safe return of the vessel. A decree for a sale of the vessel may be obtained where coowners equal in interest cannot agree on her use.

As between part owners, those owning a majority in interest have the right to control the use of the vessel,[92] and, if necessary, may maintain a suit in admiralty to compel the dissenting part owners, if they are in possession of the ship, to yield the property to those who have thus the right to employ it in trade or commerce,[93] but they may recover possession only where it appears that it is their intention so to use it.[94] In the exercise of the right of control the majority owners may change the employment of the vessel from that in which it has been engaged to any other trade or business for which it is suitable.[95] The majority owners, however, must communicate their design as to employing the vessel to the minority,[96] and, as hereinafter discussed, if required, must give security for the safe return of the vessel; but, subject to this right of a minority owner, the majority owners have unlimited control over his interest.[97] If the minority owners do not dissent from the use to which the vessel is put and require security, they will be bound by all acts and contracts of the majority owners in the use of the vessel,[98] and, as discussed infra subdivision b (3)–(5) of this section, by all the liabilities incurred by the vessel in due course of trade.

98. Ga.—Swift v. Tatner, 15 S.E. 842, 89 Ga. 660, 32 Am.S.R. 101.

If the majority owners decline to employ the vessel at all, the minority owners have a right to take possession and employ the ship in the same manner as the majority could have employed it,[99] and in like manner may compel a surrender of the possession of the vessel for such purpose.[1]

Security for safe return. The minority owners, who dissent from a voyage or use of the vessel by the majority owners, are entitled to a bond or security from the latter, stipulating for the safe return of the vessel, or, in case of her loss, to pay to the minority owners the value of their shares,[2] and the right to such bond is conditioned merely on absence of consent to the contemplated use of the ship,[3] and not on existence of a cause for dissatisfaction.[4] The right to such security may be enforced in a court of admiralty.[5] On the giving of such security, the dissenting minority owners will not be entitled to share in the profits or be liable for the expenses of running the ship, as discussed infra subdivision b (3) of this section. The condition or stipulation of the bond must be fairly complied with,[6] and where it is for the safe return of the vessel to a named port it is not satisfied by her return to another port.[7] The condition of the bond usually applies only to the particular voyage named therein,[8] and under the Admiralty Rules there is no right to have the condition cover more than one voyage,[9] although the other owners may, if willing, give bond for other voyages.[10]

The usual practice in this country is to require a bond in double the estimated value of the dissenting minority owners' shares in the vessel.[11]

Sale on disagreement. An order of court decreeing a sale of the vessel and a division of the proceeds between the owners may be obtained on the application of either party where the owners of equal interests in a vessel cannot agree concerning her use and employment,[12] or where, under some laws, an offer to buy or sell has been submitted by the owners asking for the sale, and been refused.[13] In order to warrant such a sale the disagreement must relate not merely to the question of employment, but to the manner in which the vessel shall be employed,[14] and must be such as to prevent employment of the vessel;[15] and the owners asking for a sale must propose different employment for her,[16] or, if they merely object to the voyage proposed, they must give some reasonable ground therefor.[17] It has also been stated that a sale may be ordered where a minority do not wish to employ the vessel, but the majority who do wish to employ it cannot give a sufficient stipulation,[18] or where a majority in value, showing it to be for the general good, ask for a sale.[19] Such a sale will not be ordered at the instance of minority owners who cannot agree with the majority as to the employment of the vessel[20] except in case of an unreasonable refusal of the majority to employ the vessel.[21]

(3) Profits and Expenses

In the absence of dissent, a part owner of a ship shares in the profits and expenses of her use, in proportion to his interest.

Except where one or more of the part owners dissent from the voyage or employment of the vessel, each part owner is entitled to his proportionate share of the net profits or earnings of the vessel[22] Except where the necessary expenses are incurred in a state or country where the law creates a solidary obligation therefor,[23] each part owner entitled to share in the profits of the ship is likewise liable for his proportionate share of the expenses incurred in obtaining such profits or earnings.[24] If one part owner has made advances for the adventure or paid claims arising out of it, he is entitled to contribution from his coowners for their shares thereof[25] unless the voyage was an illegal one.[26] On the other hand, he is not entitled to contribution for advances paid for expenses not incurred on behalf of the coowners or which they were not bound to pay,[27] or for money expended without the coowners' knowledge or consent, for repairs in a home port.[28]

Dissenting owners. Part owners who dissent from the voyage or use of the vessel and take security for its safe return, and refuse to bear or be responsible for any part of the expense or losses, are not entitled to share in the profits of the venture[29] or to any compensation for the use of their interest,[30] and are not liable for the expenses thereof,[31] and it has been held in this connection that, although a part owner dislikes the voyage, unless he expressly dissents, it will be regarded as a voyage with his consent.[32] A part owner who dissents from the authority of the managing coowner to bind him for supplies is no longer entitled to share the profits, or liable for the expenses,[33] whether or not the creditors have notice of his dissent.[34]

According to some decisions the taking of a bond as security for the safe return of the vessel is necessary in order to render a part owner's dissent effective for the purposes of the above rules,[35] but other authorities have held that, while it is the best evidence that the dissenting owner has abandoned all control and interest in the voyage and is exempt from any personal liability or charge for the voyage,[36] it is not the only evidence, and proof of actual dissent is sufficient.[37]

(4) Loss of, or Injury to, Vessel or Cargo

A part owner of a ship is not liable to his coowners as for conversion because of his acts of possession and control except where there is a wrongful destruction of the vessel resulting from his fault, nor will he be responsible to third persons for damage to cargo unless he is concerned in the navigation of the ship.

A part owner of a vessel is not liable to his coowners as for a conversion thereof because of his acts of possession and control of the vessel[38] except where, through his fault, there is a wrongful destruction of the vessel or something equivalent thereto, whereby the interests of the coowners are excluded, destroyed, or ignored.[39] A sale of the vessel by a part owner does not constitute a conversion thereof as against his coowners unless they are deprived of all beneficial interest therein.[40] It has been held that a part owner is not liable for injury to, or loss of, the vessel caused by his carelessness or negligence[41] except where he has absolute control and management of the vessel,[42] but that he is liable for damage caused by his wrongfully seizing the vessel and thereby interrupting a voyage for which she is under charter.[43]

As to third persons. If the owners of a vessel are not concerned in its navigation, they are not, on the ground of ownership, liable for the loss of goods shipped on board of it;[44] but if they are entitled to its earnings, and jointly liable for losses, they may be regarded as partners, and liable as such for all liabilities incurred for injuries to, or loss of, cargo, by reason of injury to, or loss of, the vessel.[45]

(5) Repairs and Supplies

The mere fact that one shares ownership of a vessel with another affords him no power to bind his coowner for repairs and supplies, but such power may exist where there is an express or implied agency relationship.

A part owner has no general authority, merely from the fact of his relationship as owner, to bind his coowners for necessary repairs and supplies for the vessel,[46] and, conversely, the personal liability of a part owner for such repairs or supplies does not necessarily attach as an incident to his naked legal ownership, but depends on the possession, use, and control of the vessel,[47] and hence a mere nominal owner, who holds title only for the benefit of another, and who takes no part or interest in the vessel's business, is not personally liable for repairs or supplies furnished.[48]

The question, in any case, is one of agency on the part of one part owner to act for the rest.[49] As a general rule, by reason of the common interest which ordinarily exists between persons sustaining such relation to each other,[50] one part owner may, as implied agent, purchase and bind his coowners for necessary supplies and repairs suitable and proper for the vessel,[51] particularly where he is the only owner residing at the port where the vessel is at the time the repairs are made or the supplies are furnished;[52] and coowners are liable for repairs and supplies furnished and charged to the vessel after they become owners, even though the contract therefor was made before they became owners.[53] Such agency, however, is not conclusively presumed,[54] but is subject to be modified, controlled, or negatived by other facts and circumstances;[55] and, unless, by some previous act, he has misled the party furnishing the necessaries into the belief that he was responsible,[56] a coowner will not be liable for such purchase where he has actually parted with his interest, although still a registered owner,[57] or has committed the vessel to the exclusive care and control of the other owners, and thereby disentitled himself to share in her earnings,[58] or has given them notice to incur no further expense on the vessel,[59] or has expressly dissented from the employment of the vessel, and communicated such dissent to the master or ship's husband.[60] The exemption of the owner or part owner in such cases does not depend on notice to the person supplying the necessaries or making the repairs of the facts exempting him from liability;[61] and, if a materialman has had no previous dealing with the dissenting owner, notice of such dissent need not be given to him.[62]

Contribution. Whether a part owner of vessels is obliged in law to contribute to the expense of preserving or repairing them can be dealt with only after such part owner has refused to make a contribution on demand.[63] The law does not authorize a suit for contribution by a coöwner of a vessel against the other part owners where such coöwner has paid a bill due from the vessel.[64] The managing owners are entitled to demand from their coowners a contribution to the necessary expense of future operations,[65] but are not entitled to withhold net profits from past operations which have already been allocated to them.[66]

At home or foreign port. The distinction has been made that a part owner may bind his coöwners for repairs or supplies in a foreign port, without consulting them,[67] but in a home port, where the owners reside, a part owner who has not the general legal authority of a master, as discussed infra §§ 60, 63, or the special authority of a ship's husband or agent, infra § 17, cannot bind his coöwners

If one of such coöwners can adopt such a measure, so could the others, and if such suits could be maintained for expenses they could be maintained for profits at the end of each trip, and the result might be a continued series of vexatious litigations, without any tendency to adjust the general accounts between the parties. —Hardy v. for repairs and supplies without their consent and orders[68] unless he has undisputed possession of the vessel.[69] If the person making the repairs or furnishing the supplies, in such a case, knows who the other owners are, and, having an opportunity to consult them, neglects to do so, unless he can show that they all assented, he must be presumed to have furnished the supplies or repairs on the credit of the part owner ordering them,[70] and, furthermore, if such a person knows that the part owner ordering the supplies has assumed control against the wishes of his coowners, he will be regarded as acting in collusion with the usurping part owner, and the others will not be liable.[71]

Acceptance of note. The mere fact that the person furnishing the repairs or supplies accepts a note from one of the joint owners has been held not to show that credit is given exclusively to such owner or that his coöwners are released[72] unless it is shown that the note was taken as payment and with the intent to discharge the other owners[73]

The majority in interest may bind all the owners in the purchase of suitable equipment and preparation of the vessel.[74]

c. Remedies

(1) Between coöwners
(2) By or against third persons

(1) Between Coöwners

A part owner of a ship may have a right to an accounting from his coowner enforceable in equity, or, in an otherwise proper case, may sue at law where no partnership is involved. A part owner may enjoin a sale or improper use of the ship.

A person owning an undivided interest in a vessel as a tenant in common has a right to an account of all the earnings and profits of the ship by all the other part owners;[75] and the ordinary remedy of part owners to obtain an adjustment of the ship's account among themselves is a suit in equity.[76] Equity will, however, deny an accounting for alleged partnership profits from the operation of a jointly owned vessel where it appears that the vessel was illegally registered in plaintiff's name to avoid the rule of law precluding registration of a vessel of her type in the name of defendant, who is an alien,[77] although equity may under such circumstances take cognizance of a suit to have plaintiff decreed half owner of the ship[78] The general rule that relief of this character should be obtained in equity proceedings is not absolute or unqualified;[79] it applies only to cases relating to earnings and disbursements, when no settlement has been made or account stated between the coöwners,[80] and in a proper case an action on account stated may be maintained by one coöwner against another.[81]

If no question of partnership is involved, an action is maintainable at law,[82] such as an action by one part owner to recover his share of the earnings of the vessel.[83] If the joint interest between them has been determined, or, in case of a partnership, it has been dissolved, and on a settlement and discharge of accounts and liabilities a balance remains due to one part owner, it may be recovered in an action of assumpsit.[84] Where the exact interest of one of several coöwners in the vessel and the exact amount which he is entitled to recover from his coöwners can be ascertained without an accounting, the appropriate remedy of a part owner against his coöwners, after a sale by them of the ship as their own exclusive property, ignoring his right to it, is by an action at law.[85] An action at law may also be maintained by a part owner for a breach by his coöwner of an agreement for the building of the vessel.[86]

Recovery for repairs and supplies. A part owner who has made expenditures for necessary repairs and supplies may maintain an action at law against a coowner, to recover the latter's share thereof.[87] Where the repairs were made in a home port, it has been held that a joint owner who assents to or authorizes repairs or improvements to be made is answerable therefor, and that a lien exists against his property for the amount thereof,[88] and that the joint owner in possession may deduct from the profits received the costs of all proper expenditure,[89] but that one joint owner cannot recover a personal judgment against his coowner for the latter's share of such repairs, in the absence of a contract to that effect,[90] and that mere silence on the part of the coöwner in such a case, coupled with knowledge of the fact of the repairs and improvements, does not bind him to a contract on which recovery can be had by way of a personal judgment for money in excess of the profits earned.[91]

Recovery for services. Ordinarily a part owner of a vessel cannot acquire a lien thereon for services rendered while he is such owner,[92] and, if he has a statutory right to proceed against the vessel for such services, he can do so only in the manner prescribed by the statute.[93]

Enjoining use or sale of ship. An owner of an unequal moiety of a vessel will be restrained by injunction from employing the vessel contrary to the wish of the other owner;[94] but where the majority owners have given bond to account for the shares of the minority owners an injunction will not issue to restrain the majority from running the ship[95] One part owner of a vessel may maintain a bill in equity to enjoin the other from selling his share and to subject it to other claims for which complainant is liable.[96]

(2) By or against Third Persons

As a general rule an action by part owners of a vessel must be joint, in the names of all the joint owners, where it is brought on a contract with a third person, which is joint in its nature.

Except where by statute suit may be brought in the name of the vessel,[97] an action by part owners must be joint, in the names of all the part owners, where it is brought on a contract with a third person, which is joint in its nature,[98] as in the case of an action for the recovery of freight.[99] Where, however, the language of the contract is several, and the interests of the parties are several, the action must be several,[1] and accordingly a part owner may sue alone where all the contracts and transactions of a vessel are carried on in his name.[2] He may also sue for his share of a demand due the owners, without joining his coöwner, whose share has already been paid;[3] and it has been held that a part owner may sustain a petitory suit against a merely fraudulent possessor without joining the other part owners.[4]

Action for proceeds of sale. If part owners give a joint authority to an agent to sell the entire ship, they cannot maintain separate actions against him for their respective shares of the money,[5] but may do so if they separately authorize the agent to sell their respective shares of the ship.[6] A part owner may also sue alone for his share of the surplus proceeds of a sale on execution against him and other owners[7]

Effect of death. In the absence of statute, if one of the part owners, who have been joined as plaintiffs, dies, the right of action survives to the surviving part owners,[8] who may afterward be compelled to pay to the personal representatives of deceased the value of his share;[9] and if they have been joined as defendants the executor or personal representative of the one so dying cannot be sued or joined with the survivors.[10]

§ 17. Managing Owner or Ship's Husband

a. In general
b Powers, duties, and liabilities
c. Remuneration and reimbursement

a. In General

A "ship's husband" is ordinarily defined as the general agent of the owner for all affairs of the ship in her home port, and a managing owner or ship's husband acts for all purposes within his powers as agent of the owners.

"Ship's husband" is an expressive maritime phrase,[11] to designate a class of agents, whose chief employment it is, among other things, to purchase the ship's stores for her voyage, and to make disbursements for the ship's use, and to make out an account of these transactions for their employers, the owners of the ship.[12] The "ship's husband" has been variously defined as an agent of the owner of the ship;[13] the general agent of the owner with respect to all the affairs of the ship in the home port;[14] the person who in the home port, where the vessel belongs, does what the owner would otherwise do;[15] a steward on land to the owner of the ship, as the officer bearing that name is on board when the ship is at sea;[16] and sometimes merely an agent for conducting the necessary measures on the return of the ship to port.[17]

A managing owner or ship's husband for all purposes within the scope of his powers acts as the agent of the owners of the vessel or of those of them who join in the adventure.[18] He may be appointed either by a written instrument or orally,[19] or his appointment may be inferred from his exercising the duties of his office with the knowledge and consent of the owners.[20] A ship's husband has been held not to be the owner of the ship pro hac vice,[21] although, where a corporation managing a ship under a general agency contract with the War Shipping Administration of the federal government remains the employer sufficiently to be liable to members of the crew under the Jones Act, it has been said that such managing corporation cannot escape the duties of an owner pro hac vice in other respects.[22]

Liability of shipping agent. Where a shipping agent acts as such and not as principal in booking a cargo, and the shipper is chargeable with knowledge of the facts, the agent is not liable to the shipper for the failure of the ship to transport the cargo.[23]

b. Powers, Duties, and Liabilities

(1) In general
(2) Borrowing money
(3) Repairs and supplies

(1) In General

As a general rule it is the duty of a ship's husband to conduct all the affairs and incidental arrangements for the due employment of the ship in commerce and navigation, and to do whatever is necessary to enable the ship to prosecute her voyage and earn freight.

The powers and duties of a ship's husband or managing owner are determined mainly by usage,[24] and, in the absence of a special agreement, are, in general, to provide for the complete seaworthiness of the ship;[25] to see that she has on board all necessary and proper papers;[26] to procure and enter into charter parties and contracts for freight;[27] to appoint the officers and mariners;[28] to make a general average loss adjustment or cause it to be made;[29] and generally to conduct all the affairs and incidental arrangements for the due employment of the ship in commerce and navigation,[30] and do whatever is necessary to enable the ship to prosecute her voyage and earn freight.[31] Within the scope of his powers, the managing owner or ship's husband acts at the expense and risk of all coöwners who do not dissent,[32] and, accordingly, to such extent he may bind the owners, or such of them as join in the adventure, by his contracts.[33] Where the ship's husband is not a part owner of the ship, all the owners are responsible in solido for his just expenditures and charges,[34] but, where he is part owner, each is liable only for his share thereof.[35]

Limitations of powers. It has been said that the statement that a managing owner or ship's husband may do whatever is necessary to enable the ship to prosecute her voyage cannot be taken literally, but must be restricted by the state of facts in the particular case,[36] and that he is not warranted in assuming extraordinary powers without obtaining authority from the owners if they are readily available for communication.[37] He cannot without special authority purchase a cargo for the owners,[38] or give up a lien for freight,[39] or bind the owners for the expenses of a criminal prosecution,[40] or sell and transfer claims due to the vessel and owners.[41] When forbidden to do so, a managing owner cannot bind his coöwners for expenses,[42] and such expenses may be charged to his own share.[43]

Termination of powers. The implied authority of a managing owner or ship's husband to do whatever is necessary for the employment of the vessel ceases when it is revoked,[44] such as by the death of his coöwner,[45] or when anything is done which has the effect of rebutting the presumption which ordinarily arises as to such implied authority.[46] A managing owner's authority to bind minority owners for subsequent costs, disbursements, and expenses, is also terminated by a libel of the vessel.[47]

Bail of vessel. A managing owner or ship's husband may bind the coöwners for bail procured to release the vessel from arrest, unless it has been seized in a case in which there is no personal responsibility on the owners, and they have not authorized or sanctioned the bail, and there is no such emergency as would call for the assumption of personal responsibility.[48]

Duty to account. It is the duty of a managing owner or ship's husband to account to the coöwners or owners, within a reasonable time, for all moneys and profits received by him in the execution of his agency for them,[49] and he is not entitled to hold any profits which he incidentally obtains in the execution of his duty,[50] even though it is sanctioned by usage.[51] In rendering his account, he is entitled to credit for any due and proper application of earnings received by him,[52] including the payment of a valid and subsisting indebtedness, no matter when contracted.[53]

Duty to indemnify. A managing agent is not liable to indemnify the shipowner against the consequences of careless navigation of the ship by a compulsory pilot,[54] unless he has assumed such liability by agreement.[55]

Insurance. The power of a part owner or a ship's husband to effect insurance on the interests of others in the ship or cargo is discussed in Insurance § 219.

(2) Borrowing Money

In the absence of official authority, a managing owner or ship's husband ordinarily lacks power to bind the coöwners for money borrowed on the vessel's account.

A managing owner or ship's husband, without official authority therefor, ordinarily has no power to bind the coowners for money borrowed on the vessel's account,[56] especially where it is not connected with the present necessities of the vessel or its preparation for a voyage;[57] nor can the owners be held to have impliedly ratified such borrowing from the mere fact that they received the benefits therefrom in repairs made on the vessl.[58] It has been held, however, that, where the circumstances are such as to justify his purchasing on the credit of the owners, he will be justified, even in a home port, in borrowing money to pay for the required articles,[59] but in order to charge the owners, in such a case, it must appear that the money not only was borrowed for a proper purpose, connected with the ship or her navigation, but that it was so applied.[60]

(3) Repairs and Supplies

A managing owner or ship's husband ordinarily has power to bind the owners or coowners for repairs and supplies.

As a general rule, a managing owner or ship's husband has implied authority to bind the owners or coowners for necessary repairs[61] and equipment and supplies.[62] Where the repairs are made or the supplies furnished exclusively on the credit of the ship's husband who ordered them, no one part owner may be held liable therefor, where he has neither authorized nor ratified the purchases, but has dissented from them.[63]

In the home port, where all the owners reside, the managing owner, although registered as such at the customhouse, has been held to have no power, merely by virtue of that relation, to order repairs and supplies, and bind coowners to a personal liability therefor;[64] nor do they become liable merely because the creditor, on his books, charges the supplies against the vessel and owners.[65] On the other hand, it has been held that a ship's husband has power to contract even in a home port for repairs which are absolutely necessary.[66]

c. Remuneration and Reimbursement

A managing owner or ship's husband is ordinarily entitled to remuneration for services and to reimbursement for expenditures performed and incurred for the general benefit of the ship and her owners.

Where the remuneration of a managing owner or ship's husband for services performed by him for the general benefit of the vessel and owners is fixed by agreement among the part owners, he is entitled to the amount agreed on.[67] In the absence of such agreement, he is entitled to reasonable compensation for his proper services.[68] He is also entitled to reimbursement for proper expenditures within the scope of his agency, but not for expenditures or advances, made without the owners' consent, in respect of matters which were not within the scope of his authority.[69] A ship's agent engaged to attend to the discharge and booking of cargo has been held an independent contractor with respect to reimbursement for expenses of litigation in successfully defending a suit brought against him for alleged negligence.[70]

Liability of nonconsenting owner for salary. One part owner cannot be required to contribute to the payment of a salary to the managing owner or ship's husband, which has been agreed on without his knowledge or consent.[71]

§ 18. Sales

a. In general
b Evidence of sale
c Modification or rescission
d. Conditional sales

a. In General

Where part owners are not partners, none may sell the interest of a coowner without the latter's consent; but, where a partnership exists, it has been held that one partner may sell the whole ship. A part owner may sell his own interest in the vessel.

Where the part owners of a vessel are not partners in such ownership, any one of them may sell his own interest at his pleasure;[72] but he cannot sell the interest of a coöwner without the latter's consent,[73] even though he is the ship's husband.[74] On the other hand, where the part owners hold the ship as partners, each partner generally has authority to sell the whole ship;[75] but as to this, there is also authority to the contrary.[76]

In the absence of a statute providing otherwise, a foreigner may become a purchaser of a vessel or of a share therein,[77] but, as discussed supra § 3, the vessel may thereby lose its national character under the registry laws, or, in case of a licensed vessel, become liable to forfeiture, under enrollment and license laws, as considered supra § 11.

What law governs. In accordance with general rules with respect to sales, the validity of a contract of sale of a vessel is governed by the laws of the state where it is made and performed,[78] and this rule applies to the sale or transfer of a vessel which at the time is at sea.[79]

b. Evidence of Sale

The bill of sale and enrollment of a ship may afford prima facie evidence of her sale; a contract of sale may be proved by parol.

The rules of evidence as to sales in general, as discussed in Sales § 55, apply with respect to evidence as to the sale and delivery of a vessel.[80] The bill of sale and enrollment are prima facie evidence of a bona fide sale;[81] but it is not required that the contract should be proved to have been made in express terms, and it may be inferred from conversations and acts of the parties like other contracts,[82] and may be proved by parol.[83]

c. Modification or Rescission

A contract for the sale of a vessel may be rescinded for fraud or other sufficient cause in compliance with the general rules governing rescission of sales.

A contract of sale of a vessel may be rescinded by either party for fraud or misrepresentation of the other as an inducement to the sale;[84] and the fact that the seller resells the vessel, without notice to the buyer, who has paid part of the purchase price, and without compensating him, amounts to a rescission and abandonment of the contract.[85] Such a contract may also be canceled on the ground of impossibility of performance,[86] but not on the ground of mere hardship,[87] such as a mere provisional restraint by the government.[88] A buyer cannot rescind because of the vessel's failure to conform to a warranty given by an agent without the seller's authority.[89] A contract for the sale of a vessel, then under construction, is not changed in its nature as a sale by a supplementary contract which expressly recognizes the buyer's equity in the vessel and his obligation to take and pay for it with notes and mortgages in reimbursement of advances made by the seller;[90] nor is it abandoned or rescinded by the seller's seizure of the vessel and materials, in accordance with the terms of the contract, on the buyer's default.[91]

d. Conditional Sales

Ships are goods and chattels subject to conditional sales.

Vessels are goods and chattels subject to conditional sales as such,[92] and within the general rules of law and statutory provisions relating to such sales.[93] A conditional sale of a vessel, therefore, is within the scope of a statutory provision requiring the seller, on retaking possession, to retain the property for a limited period, during which time the buyer may comply with the terms of the contract and receive the property,[94] and rendering the seller liable, if he does not make a sale of the vessel, to repay to the buyer the amount he has paid,[95] and the seller, in such a case, cannot retain any of the amount paid, as rental for the use of the vessel,[96] but he may recover or set off amounts paid at the buyer's request and as his agent for insurance, repairs, and other expenses which, under the contract, should have been paid by the buyer.[97] Such a statutory provision is not invalid by reason of the fact that it is interpreted as requiring a vessel retaken by the conditional seller to be withdrawn from service for such period,[98] nor, as so interpreted, does it conflict with the Enrollment Act,[99] nor does it conflict with a recording act which expressly declares that it does not affect the title to a vessel as between the parties.[1]

As to application of insurance. Where title to vessels sold under a conditional bill of sale does not pass, the seller, on damage to the vessels, is entitled to have the proceeds of an insurance policy, payable to him as his interest might appear, paid to repairmen, and applied in payment of a claim against such vessels, rather than to payment of other indebtedness of the buyer to repairmen, who knew that the payment represented proceeds of policies and belonged to the seller.[2]

§ 19. —— Requisites and Validity in General

The general rules governing the sale of personal property ordinarily govern in respect of the requisites and validity of a sale of a vessel.

The general rules governing a sale and transfer of personal property or chattels are ordinarily applicable to the sale of a vessel in respect of the requisites and validity of the sale,[3] and as to whether the sale is executed or merely executory.[4] In accordance with such rules, except where the sale is required to be made by bill of sale or other writing, as discussed infra § 20, it may be made orally,[5] or it may be implied from the acts, words, or conduct of the parties which show a mutual intention to effect a sale;[6] and the fact that the contracting parties subsequently agree to have the oral contract reduced to writing does not impair it.[7] The sale is not an absolute one as long as any condition remains to be performed before title passes.[8]

Possession. A good title cannot be transferred by one who has neither actual nor constructive possession of a vessel or the right of possession.[9]

Options. An agreement between the owner of a vessel and a prospective buyer to sell to the latter, "subject to final inspection," is an option to the buyer to buy if satisfied on inspection, and is not binding on him.[10] Where, after operating a vessel under a charter containing an option to purchase, a sale contract is prepared and signed by the owner, and the charterer, while not signing it because of objection to its provisions, which are afterward modified, pays the initial installment of the purchase price and continues to operate the vessel, such operation is under the sale contract, which supersedes the charter agreement.[11]

§ 20. —— Bill of Sale or Other Writing

a. In general
b. Requisites and validity
c. Construction and operation

a. In General

While a bill of sale has been said to be essential to passage of title to a ship under the general maritime law, it is ordinarily held that in the United States title may pass as between buyer and seller without bill of sale or other writing.

While a bill of sale is the usual evidence of title under admiralty practice,[12] and has been said to be essential under the general maritime law,[13] in the United States it is generally held that as between the buyer and seller the sale of a ship is complete and title passes on the making of the contract of sale accompanied by a delivery of the possession of the vessel,[14] or by payment and acceptance of the price.[15] In this connection it has been said that in the United States documentation is merely for the purpose of fixing the nationality of a vessel and that bills of sale and registration are designed to give notice to purchasers and mortgagees of the record of title,[16] and that a bill of sale or other instrument of writing is not necessary for passage of title as between the parties,[17] unless required by the provisions of a contract[18] or statute.[19] Such a transfer ordinarily is subject to the rights of creditors;[20] but even as against creditors the seller of an interest in a vessel is not bound to deliver a bill of sale thereof, where the sale has been made with the assent of the purchaser and all the other owners, by creditors having liens thereon, and the proceeds applied in payment of their debts.[21]

b. Requisites and Validity

An instrument tendered as a bill of sale of a ship should comply with the requirements essential to constitute it a bill of sale, and ordinarily should express the matter included in the transfer of title; but such a document is not invalidated by failure to recite the certificate of registry or enrollment of the vessel.

Where a written instrument is required or given, it should comply with the requirements essential to constitute it a bill of sale,[22] and ordinarily should express the matter to be included in the transfer of title,[23] but general terms, such as appurtenances and necessaries, which have a fixed and technical meaning, may be employed.[24]

Recitals. A transfer of a vessel is not rendered invalid by the fact that the bill of sale does not recite the certificate of her registry or enrollment prescribed by the registry act,[25] or that it makes an inaccurate recital thereof,[26] as the only penalty of a nonrecital or inaccurate recital of the register, and a corresponding change of papers, is that the vessel ceases to enjoy the privileges obtained by registration.[27] Blanks for such recitals in a bill of sale may be filled up, with the consent of the seller and buyer, after its execution and delivery.[28]

Enrollment. It is not necessary to the validity of a bill of sale of a vessel that it shall be enrolled in the customhouse,[29] enrollment being essential only to entitle the vessel to the character and privileges of an American vessel.[30]

c. Construction and Operation

A bill of sale or similar transfer of a vessel should be construed to effectuate the intention of the parties as revealed by the terms of the instrument

A bill of sale or other instrument of transfer of a vessel should be construed according to the intention of the parties as ascertained from the terms of the instrument,[31] as in respect of what property is included in the transfer;[32] and, where it includes, either expressly or impliedly, appurtenances or necessaries, only those things will be regarded as passing as are really necessary to the vessel in carrying on its accepted business,[33] and there is no implied warranty that duplicates shall be furnished.[34]

§ 21. —— Delivery of Vessel

Delivery of possession is ordinarily not essential to passing of title as between buyer and seller, but it is generally necessary in order to bar the rights of third persons.

Except where it is understood and intended, by the parties at the time of making the contract, that a formal delivery shall be made to complete the sale,[35] delivery of possession of the vessel ordinarily is not necessary, as between the seller and buyer, to the transfer of a complete and effectual title,[36] especially where there is a general statutory provision to that effect.[37] On the other hand, as against a subsequent buyer or creditor having no notice, a delivery is necessary[38] Delivery of possession to the purchaser of a share of a vessel ordinarily is not necessary, where the vessel is in possession of the owner or owners of the other shares.[39]

If the vessel is in port at the time of sale, actual delivery is usually held necessary to perfect the title against subsequent buyers and creditors,[40] unless the seller has only constructive possession and the vessel is so situated that actual delivery cannot be made, in which case a symbolical delivery is sufficient.[41] If the vessel is at sea, a delivery of such evidence of title as the seller possesses is sufficient as against creditors and subsequent purchasers to pass title to the buyer,[42] without immediate delivery of the vessel itself,[43] provided the buyer takes possession of the vessel within a reasonable time after she returns within his reach or control;[44] and it has been intimated that, if notice of the sale is forwarded by the buyer to the captain, on the vessel's arrival at another port, it would be equivalent to taking possession[45] However, in order to defeat his title, as against creditors, the buyer's negligence in failing to take possession within a reasonable time must be such as to afford ground for a presumption of fraud.[46]

Place. Where, according to the terms of the contract of sale, delivery of the vessel is to be made at a specified place, the sale is not complete until delivery is made at that place;[47] but, where the place of delivery is not designated in the contract of sale, and there is nothing in the condition or situation of the parties to determine it, it is the privilege of the buyer to name the place, provided it is a reasonable and suitable one;[48] and, if he refuses or fails to provide such place, a delivery may be tendered at a safe and usual anchorage in the harbor.[49] In offering delivery, the seller must afford an opportunity to the buyer to make an examination,[50] but he is under no obligation to incur any such unusual expense as would be involved in hauling the vessel into dry dock, and making a delivery there.[51]

Delay in delivery. Where a vessel is bought by a contract under which it is to be built, a provision for delay caused by "force majeure" does not apply to a delay caused by the breaking of the ways when the vessel is launched.[52]

§ 22. —— Warranties

In the absence of an express warranty, the rule of caveat emptor applies to the sale of a vessel.

The usual rules as to warranties in sales of goods and chattels, as discussed in Sales §§ 301-386, apply in case of sale of a vessel, such as in respect of the creation or existence of a warranty,[53] and that the buyer's acceptance of the vessel does not discharge the seller from liability for breach of warranty.[54] The rule of caveat emptor applies to the sale of a vessel,[55] in the absence of an express warranty,[56] and a simple bargain and sale of the vessel do not imply a warranty that it is seaworthy or in a serviceable condition, where the buyer acts on the report of a surveyor employed by him and does not demand an express warranty.[57] An express warranty in a bill of sale of a ship and her freight that the ship is free from encumbrance does not exclude an implied warranty that the freight is also unencumbered,[58] and, therefore, does not defeat liability for an implied misrepresentation by concealment of the fact that the freight is encumbered.[59] A statutory provision which imposes on a seller the obligation of warranting a thing sold against its hidden defects has been held applicable to the sale of a vessel,[60] and, in case of breach of such warranty, the buyer may retain the vessel and maintain an action for reduction of the price by reason of the difference in value between the vessel as warranted and as it was in fact.[61]

Effect of waiver of inspection. Waiver of a dry dock inspection, as provided for in the contract for sale, for which allowance is made to the buyer, inures to the latter's benefit to the extent of the allowance,[62] but does not relieve the seller from his warranty of fitness of the vessel.[63] On the other hand, where the buyer agrees to a modification of the contract waiving dry dock inspection, in consideration of a reduction in price, he does not rely on the seller's implied warranty of fitness and cannot recover for breach thereof.[64]

Sale "with all faults" or "as is." Where the vessel is sold "with all faults without any allowance for any defect or error whatever," there is no warranty,[65] and the fact that the sale is "with all faults" puts the buyer on his guard to use his senses to discover any defects or faults therein,[66] and the seller is not liable for defects in the vessel whether or not he knew of them,[67] unless he used some artifice to conceal them from the buyer.[68] On the other hand, the use of such phrase does not relieve the seller from liability for breach of warranty as to the character or method of construction of the vessel,[69] or from liability for deceit as to the age of the vessel.[70] The term "as is" should be construed in connection with its context, and does not necessarily negative the existence of a warranty.[71]

§ 23. —— Rights and Liabilities of Parties

a. In general
b. Of seller
c. Of buyer

a. In General

The general rules governing the rights and liabilities of a buyer and seller ordinarily control with respect to the rights of the buyer and seller of a vessel. The buyer is usually entitled to freights accruing when he takes possession of the vessel.

The general rules of law and statutory provisions pertaining to sales of personalty ordinarily control in determining and enforcing the rights and liabilities of the parties to a contract of sale of a vessel.[72]

Right to freights. As between a buyer and seller, pending freight is regarded as an incident of the ship,[73] and, therefore, unless it is otherwise provided by the contract of sale, the buyer, on taking possession, has the right to all freights then accruing,[74] and succeeds to any liens which the seller had to enforce payment of such freight.[75] The buyer is also entitled to all freights which are fully earned while he is in possession, under an executory contract of sale.[76] On the other hand, freight earned after the seller retakes the ship for breach of the contract of sale belongs to him,[77] including pending freight which is not due until delivery of the cargo, after possession is retaken;[78] and ordinarily this right of the seller cannot be defeated by the buyer's assignment of the freight moneys to a third person.[79] Where, however, the seller has estopped himself from claiming ownership of the vessel, he cannot set up any right to freights as against the buyer's assignee thereof.[80] So, also, where, under such assignment, charter party commitments are carried out under the supervision and management of a trustee, and an assignor is not put in default, and no attempt is made by the seller to terminate the contract and retake the vessel, the seller cannot claim freight earned under the trustee's management as against the buyer's assignee.[81] The seller's lien for advancements and disbursements, in performance of a charter party under which freights are earned, constitutes a claim to freight moneys prior to that of an assignee of the agreed buyer, where the freights are earned under the management of the trustee after the buyer became insolvent,[82] and the seller's rights in such case, with relation to freight moneys and disbursements made in earning them, are the same as those of a mortgagee.[83]

b. Of Seller

(1) In general
(2) Seller's remedies

(1) In General

The responsibility of the owner of a ship as such ceases on completion of his sale of the vessel, and, even though the seller retains title as security for the purchase price, he will not be liable for contracts made in behalf of the ship by a buyer in possession.

On the completion of the sale of a vessel, the responsibility of the seller, as owner, ceases.[84] One having title only for security is not personally liable for contracts with respect to the ship made by his conditional buyer while in possession,[85] and one holding legal title simply as security for the sum due him on a sale thereof, but having neither possession nor control, is not an owner within the meaning of statutory provisions imposing liability on the "owner" of a watercraft for material furnished it.[86]

Condition as earlier warranted

Where sellers had warranted tug to be tight and in fair condition with certain exceptions even if sellers, a few days later, in answer to inquiry from buyers, stated that price was "as is," the term "as is" meant the condition of the tug as earlier warranted and such term would not avoid the effect of the warranty—Owens v. Anderson, supra.

Repairs and supplies. After the contract of sale is completed and the vessel is delivered into the possession and use of the buyer, the seller is not liable for repairs or supplies furnished to the vessel on the order or direction of the buyer,[87] and this rule applies, although the repairs or supplies are furnished in the belief that the original owner is liable,[88] and although the contract therefor is made prior to a legal transfer of the vessel,[89] as where by the express terms of the contract the seller retains the legal title in himself, for the purpose of securing the consideration money, until it is paid.[90] The original owner is not liable to pay for supplies furnished a vessel at sea, after he has sold all his interest in the vessel, although neither the master nor the merchant furnishing the supplies had any knowledge of the sale.[91]

Waiver of rights. Where a vessel is already in possession of the buyer at the time of the signing of a contract for its sale to him calling for a cash payment, the buyer may not properly claim that the seller waived the condition of cash payment by a subsequent delivery to him, since the delivery was in fact prior to the execution of the sales contract,[92] nor does the seller's acceptance of the buyer's checks constitute a waiver of the requirement of cash payment until the seller is able to determine their worth and negotiability.[93]

(2) Seller's Remedies

The seller of a ship may in a proper case sue for repossession, for damages for breach of contract, or for the price or value of the vessel.

The seller of a ship may sue to recover possession of the vessel from the buyer where the latter fails to perform a condition on the performance of which title was to vest in him;[94] or he may sue for damages where the buyer breaches the contract of sale,[95] except where he retakes the property, and, under the terms of the contract, retains amounts which have already been paid, as liquidated damages.[96] Under a statute making unenforceable any provision in a contract by which damage or compensation for a breach is determined in advance, except where the fixing of actual damages is extremely difficult or impracticable, the seller cannot, on breach of the contract of sale, recover a deposit in escrow made by the buyer under the guise of a penalty, liquidated damages, or forfeiture.[97]

Suit for price or value. If the seller has substantially performed his part of the contract of sale, he may maintain an action for the balance of the purchase price if the buyer fails or refuses to perform the contract and pay as agreed;[98] and, where the action is on a constructive contract, since the buyer by accepting delivery and retaining possession of the vessel becomes liable for the purchase price, notwithstanding failure of the builders to comply with their contract, it is unnecessary, in an action for such purchase price, to allege a waiver on the part of defendant of provisions of the contract;[99] but such an action cannot be maintained where the buyer repudiates the contract without having signed a memorandum in writing or without having accepted the vessel, as required by statute.[1] Where, under the contract, a certain percentage of the purchase money is deposited with a stakeholder to be paid to the seller on tendering a bill of sale and delivery of the vessel, and to be forfeited to the seller in case of the buyer's breach, the seller can recover the amount of such deposit from the stakeholder, even though the latter has made no promise to pay it to the seller.[2]

Actions. In suits by the seller of a ship the general rules ordinarily control in respect of matters of defense,[3] pleading,[4] evidence,[5] trial,[6] and amount of recovery.[7]

Lien generally. Under and subject to the rules governing a seller's lien generally, as discussed in Sales §§ 390–402, the seller of a vessel has a lien thereon for the balance of the purchase money,[8] and some statutes expressly provide for such a lien.[9] The seller's lien is entitled to priority over claims for supplies furnished to the vessel by the direction of the buyer,[10] but the seller is not entitled to such priority for disbursements made by him on the vessel after retaking it from the buyer.[11] The lien for purchase money has been held to be lost or waived by the acceptance of a note as cash, as part of the purchase price.[12] There must be due compliance with a statutory provision prescribing the time within which such a lien may be enforced.[13] A seller cannot assert a lien against a vessel for services performed on her before sale.[14]

Where the contract of sale authorizes the seller, on the buyer's default, to resell the vessel and recover the deficiency from the buyer, the seller has a lien on an escrow purchase-money deposit to the extent of his damage or loss,[15] and the fact that the seller fails to resell on the buyer's default does not affect the lien, since such resale is not indispensable to measure the seller's damage.[16] Equity has jurisdiction of such a lien,[17] notwithstanding the action involves damages for a breach of contract for which the law provides a remedy;[18] but it cannot decree the lien under a contract which provides that the sale is to become absolute only on acceptance by the buyer after inspection, where he never makes such acceptance.[19]

(4) Buyer's remedies

(1) In General

On completion of the purchase, the buyer becomes vested with all the seller's rights in the ship, and takes her subject to existing liabilities of which he has actual or constructive notice.

An oral agreement that purchaser of vessel would pay for supplies on board and for insurance premiums for insurance protecting purchaser pending transfer, and that seller should have a maritime lien therefor, constituted a new promise, and seller was not estopped to recover for supplies and insurance premiums by provisions in the written agreement of sale, also a written declaration by seller of vessel that vessel was free of any obligations whatsoever against others did not estop seller from enforcing purchaser's oral agreement to pay for supplies on vessel, cost of moving vessel and insurance premiums, since declaration related to obligations from seller to others, and seller could have no lien against vessel or claim against purchaser until after vessel had been conveyed to purchaser.—Munson Line v. it, of which he has actual or constructive notice [21] He is also liable for prior contracts or liabilities of the seller, which he has assumed or agreed to pay.[22] Where the purchaser assumes the "indebtedness" of the ship, this comprises only existing claims for which she could be libeled and sold under decree in admiralty,[23] and the purchaser's agreement to save the vendor harmless from future claims which may arise against the "vessel interests" will not include any claim failing to fall within the true meaning of such agreement.[24] A purchaser under a contract for installment purchase of a ship may make alterations after acquiring possession where the contract provides that he may make repairs, etc, provided he does not injure her, and where the alteration does not make the vessel less valuable to the seller and owner.[25] Recovery of down payment will generally be allowed the buyer where the seller arbitrarily calls off the contemplated sale.[26]

Sale subject to requisition. A term of the contract of sale that the buyer takes the risk of the vessel being requisitioned does not imply that the vessel is at the time a free ship, and the fact that it is requisitioned but has been temporarily released does not, in the absence of fraud, give the buyer a right of action against the seller for damages for breach of contract.[27] Where the contract expressly states that the title to the vessel sold is subject to the general order of requisition by the government, the buyer is presumed to know what that requisition is, and he cannot avoid liability for breach of his contract by claiming that he understood he would have the vessel for several voyages before it was taken under that requisition, where no misrepresentations were made by the seller in that respect.[28]

Repairs and supplies. Where the sale is an absolute one, the buyer is liable for supplies subsequently furnished, even though he has never taken possession of the vessel,[29] and although neither the master nor the merchant furnishing the supplies had any knowledge of the sale,[30] unless it appears that credit was given to another,[31] or that the seller had not divested himself of his right, as owner, to the control and possession of the vessel and its earnings.[32] Although the title is not actually transferred, if the buyer is in possession, under the contract, he may be held liable for supplies furnished during his possession,[33] even though he refuses to carry out the contract of sale,[34] but this does not apply to a buyer who is in possession merely under an agreement for sale.[35] The buyer, however, is not liable for repairs made and supplies furnished before the sale,[36] unless he has specially agreed to that effect,[37] or unless the vessel was at sea at the time of the sale, in which case the buyer takes her subject to all encumbrances on her,[38] and to all lawful contracts made by the master before notice of the sale.[39]

Liability for price. Where the contract of sale is an executed one, with the title retained by the seller only to secure advances, the seller's failure to deliver a bill of sale conveying title does not relieve the buyer of his obligation to pay, where the Meaning of "injure"

The word "injure," as used in a contract for the sale of a certain ship, to be paid for by installments, by which, after the first payment, the purchaser should take possession of the ship, with liberty to make such repairs as he might wish, to load the ship, or to secure passengers for her, provided nothing was done to injure the vessel, means something which makes the vessel less valuable to the owners, and does not prevent him making an alteration therein which does not produce such an effect.—The Ferax, supra.

legal title is not conveyed because the buyer does not comply with the conditions entitling him to a conveyance.[40] Where the vessel is sold, under a construction contract, the buyer, by accepting the vessel and retaining possession, becomes liable for the contract price,[41] notwithstanding the builders have failed to comply with the contract of sale,[42] although, in such event, he may be entitled to damages for their breach.[43] Where, after the making of the contract of sale, the parties agree to an allowance or deduction of the contract price of a certain sum to cover all deficiencies or repairs of equipment, the buyer is not entitled to a further deduction to cover expenses incurred by reason of a deficiency of equipment caused by ordinary wear and tear.[44]

An option to purchase conveys no title to the optionee.[45]

Purchase through attorney in fact. Where the purchaser of a vessel executes a power of attorney reciting that an attorney in fact is given authority to represent him and to sign all documents necessary in connection with the transfer of title, such document is sufficient to clothe the attorney with power to execute an agreement of sale,[46] and to authorize the attorney to extend the seller's policy of insurance to protect the purchaser pending transfer of title,[47] and to bind the purchaser to pay for supplies aboard the ship,[48] and, even if the agreement of the attorney to pay for the cost of moving the vessel is unauthorized, it may be ratified by the purchaser's making a payment on account.[49] A purchaser's direction to his attorney in fact to turn over the papers relating to the purchase of a ship to her captain constitutes a ratification of the attorney's acts in connection with the purchase of the vessel.[50]

Purchaser attempting to repudiate rescission of contract. Where a seller has rescinded the contract for the purchaser's default, the latter or his representatives having received the benefits of rescission may not thereafter repudiate the rescission or reaffirm the contract after being sued for damages based on rescission.[51]

(2) Buyer from Part Owner

A buyer from a part owner may become vested with the latter's entire interest, but can take no more than the seller's share in the ship and her earnings.

A buyer from a part owner may become vested with his entire right and title,[52] but he takes only the interest or share which the seller has in the vessel or its earnings.[53] It has been held that a sale of an undivided interest in a vessel does not put the buyer in the seller's position as partner in the operation of the vessel.[54] A buyer is not liable for the purchase price of such interest where, before the sale is consummated, the vessel is lost;[55] nor, in the absence of special agreement, is he liable for expenditures, expenses, or liabilities incurred before that time.[56]

(3) Bona fide purchaser

The rights of buyers of vessels as bona fide purchasers are determined by the general rules.

The usual rules as to bona fide purchasers, as discussed in Sales §§ 288–300, apply in determining whether a purchaser of a vessel is a bona fide purchaser, and his rights and title.[57] It has been held that a purchaser from the owner of record is entitled to protection as a bona fide purchaser as against a prior unrecorded sale,[58] unless it appears that the sale to such purchaser is colorable and without consideration[59] An authorized but long continued possession does not estop the owner of a vessel from claiming title against a bona fide purchaser under an unauthorized sale.[60]

(4) Buyer's Remedies

The buyer of a vessel may in a proper case maintain an action against the seller for damages arising from the latter's breach of the contract to sell or for recovery of the purchase price paid.

A buyer of a vessel, or of an interest therein, may maintain an action for damages against the seller for breach of the contract to sell or of sale,[61] which damages may be recovered either in a separate action,[62] or by way of counterclaim in an action for the purchase price,[63] provided the buyer has given notice of his claim within a reasonable time, as required by statute.[64] For example, the purchaser of a vessel may be entitled to recover damages for loss resulting from her faulty construction by the seller,[65] the items recoverable depending on the facts involved as considered in the light of the usual rules governing an award of damages.[66]

Recovery of purchase price paid. The buyer may maintain an action to recover an overpayment induced by the seller's fraud,[67] and he may also maintain an action to recover purchase money which he has already paid, and which is wrongfully retained by the seller after a breach by him of the contract of sale,[68] for example, after the seller has rescinded and abandoned the contract,[69] or where the buyer has rescinded the contract because of the seller's fraud or misrepresentation,[70] or where, as provided in the contract, consummation thereof is prevented by causes beyond the control of the parties,[71] or where the buyer rejects the vessel because of its not complying with the specifications of the contract,[72] provided he has notified the seller within a reasonable time.[73] Where, however, the seller has resold the vessel and is, therefore, unable to deliver it to the buyer, creating a failure of consideration, it is unnecessary for the buyer, as a prerequisite to suing to recover purchase money which has been paid, to make a formal rescission on his part,[74] or to make a demand for performance.[75]

Actions. In suits by the buyer of a ship the usual rules govern in respect of pleading,[76] evi-

§ 24. Mortgages and Hypothecations

a. In general
b. Requisites and validity in general
c. Delivery or possession
d. Construction and operation
e. Priorities
f. Rights and liabilities of mortgagee and mortgagor

a. In General

In the absence of a statute providing otherwise, a mortgage on a ship is regarded as a mere common-law lien similar to other mortgages on chattels and without maritime incidents. The federal Ship Mortgage Act is designed to improve the investment status of ship's mortgages, and should be liberally construed in the light of its purpose.

A mortgage of a vessel is regarded as a chattel mortgage,[79] and generally has no maritime incidents,[80] and none of the characteristics of a maritime contract or loan,[81] and, therefore, except in jurisdictions in which a chattel mortgage passes the legal title, as discussed in Chattel Mortgages § 1, it has the status only of a common-law lien,[82] and, as discussed in Maritime Liens § 5, does not constitute a maritime lien, except where it is made so by statute.

Hypothecation, when applied to maritime transactions, is about the same as bottomry or respondentia,[83] although it is usually predicated of a loan by the master on the vessel, freight, or cargo, in order to raise money for the necessities of the voyage.[84] In a more general sense it is a pledge to secure a debt or engagement without a delivery or possession.[85] Such hypothecations had their origin in the necessities of commerce,[86] are of a high and privileged character, and are held in great sanctity by maritime courts.[87]

Port of documentation within the federal Ship Mortgage Act is the port at which a vessel is documented, that is, registered or enrolled or licensed under the laws of the United States, whether permanently or temporarily.[88]

Character of particular transaction. The question whether a particular transaction, although in the form of a sale of a vessel, constitutes a mortgage thereof is one of the intention of the parties as shown by the facts and circumstances of the transaction,[89] which intention may be established by any form of proof.[90] Except where the rights of innocent third persons would be prejudiced thereby,[91]

Questions for court or jury
Ordinarily, reasonableness of motor vessel purchaser's use of vessel in submitting it for acceptance by Coast Guard, as contemplated by sale contract, and time taken by him in seeking entrance of himself and vessel into Coast Guard service and returning vessel to seller after rejection for such service, are fact questions for jury; but, where there is no evidence on which jury could properly find that purchaser acted within reasonable time, court must decide question as matter of law.—Fischbach v. Provision not effecting ownership
A provision in nonmaritime chattel mortgage on barge, that mortgagor "will not use, or lease, or charter or allow any one else to use" the barge except with mortgagee's written consent, was at most a personal covenant between mortgagor and mortgagee, giving mortgagee right of action for breach thereof, and did not operate to convert the mortgage lien into ownership.—Jones v. a bill of sale of a vessel, although absolute in its terms, may be shown by parol evidence to be intended only as a mortgage,[92] as for the purpose of negativing any authority to procure supplies or repairs on the credit of its holder.[93] Positive evidence that the bill of sale was taken merely as security is not overcome by the fact that the bill has been recorded,[94] that the vessel was enrolled in the name of the transferee,[95] that he ratified the act of a coowner in taking out a policy of insurance in his own name for the benefit of all concerned,[96] or that no note or bond was taken by him.[97]

What law governs. Except to the extent that the mortgage of a vessel is regulated by federal statute, the validity and construction of such a mortgage are determined by the law of the state where it was made,[98] and it is competent for the state courts to decide what were the laws and usages of commerce which would justify the execution of such a mortgage.[99] The matter of such mortgages, however, particularly as to their recordation, as discussed infra § 25, has been regulated by acts of congress, and, to the extent that such acts have established regulations different from those recognized by the state courts, the rules of the state courts are superseded,[1] and a mortgage of a vessel according to such statute is good, although not according to state law.[2]

Federal Ship Mortgage Act. The federal Ship Mortgage Act, 46 U.S.C.A. §§ 911–1014, which has been held valid,[3] has been said to make a profound change in the maritime law.[4] The purpose of the act is to benefit the merchant marine by encouraging investment of mortgage capital in ships through the device of according a generally preferred claim status to mortgages on ships.[5] In other words, the object of the act was to enable the owners of vessels to use the vast capital invested in them with at least a part of the facility enjoyed by investors in structures on land,[6] and to that end the statute is remedial and should be liberally construed,[7] in the light of its purpose,[8] although all of its provisions as to registry and indorsement on the ship's papers should be complied with,[9] and the act should be strictly construed with respect to the protection of creditors and lienholders from fraud and the like.[10] A provision of such act to the effect that a vessel lawfully documented shall be held to continue to be so documented until its documents are surrendered with the approval of the shipping board applies only to a vessel which, when conveyed, is subject to a valid preferred mortgage and for the purposes of such mortgage.[11] The act applies to mortgages on ships of United States registry irrespective of the maritime or nonmaritime purpose to which the funds raised by the mortgage are devoted.[12] A vessel of the United States licensed at a port within

Attraction of capital

(1) The main purpose of the Ship Mortgage Act as a whole is to attract capital to domestic shipping by affording better mortgage security.—The Emma Giles, D.C.Md., 15 F.Supp. 502.

(2) The Ship Mortgage Act was designed to make ships' mortgages desirable investments, and purpose of act was to make such mortgages as available for investment as other securities with which the public is accustomed to deal, and to render that class of securities attractive which had been unmarketable before.—The Favorite, C.C.A.N.Y., 120 F.2d 899.

Promoting public confidence

Object of congress in enacting Ship Mortgage Act was to encourage investment of capital in American shipping, to improve security of investments by way of mortgage on vessels, and to promote public confidence in such investments.—Collier Advertising Service v. Hudson River Day Line, D.C.N.Y., 14 F.Supp. 335.

the United States is a proper subject of mortgage under the act.[13] Where there are several vessels and properties covered by a mortgage issued under the act, the mortgage constitutes a lien for its full amount on each piece of property.[14]

Forfeiture of the ship pursuant to the provisions of a state statute destroys an ordinary mortgage not shown to be preferred.[15]

b. Requisites and Validity in General

It is ordinarily essential to the validity of a mortgage on a ship that her mortgagor have some title or interest in the ship at the time of execution of the mortgage; a mortgage executed under the federal Ship Mortgage Act should comply with the requirements of the act.

In accordance with general rules discussed in Chattel Mortgages §§ 23–27, it is ordinarily essential to the validity of a mortgage on a ship that the mortgagor have some title or interest in the vessel at the time of its execution,[16] and, in the absence of statute, a mortgage covering all vessels then owned by the mortgagor and all he should afterward acquire is invalid as to after-acquired vessels as against intervening equities of third persons.[17] The failure of an instrument to comply with the legal requirements for execution of a chattel mortgage has been held immaterial as between the parties thereto,[18] and a misdescription of the vessel is immaterial if her identity is clear and a purchaser of the ship is not misled.[19]

Under the federal Ship Mortgage Act, 46 U.S. C.A. §§ 911–1014, a mortgage, executed thereafter, in the form of a preferred mortgage, is valid as such,[20] provided there is due compliance with all the statutory requirements.[21] Such a mortgage is valid as a mortgage as soon as it is executed and recorded, although it is not immediately indorsed on the ship's papers as required by the statute,[22] but its priority over liens which attach in the meantime may be affected thereby, as discussed infra subdivision e of this section. Irregularity in repect of the enrollment of a ship will not invalidate a mortgage on the vessel.[23] Where a mortgage on a ship covers property other than a vessel, the statute mandatorily requires that the mortgage provide for the separate discharge of such property by payment of a specified portion of the mortgage indebtedness.[24] Where the mortgage covers more than one vessel, it is not required that the mortgage

Proof that mortgage trustee was New York corporation, that its president and all directors were United States citizens and that ninety-six per cent of shares of its stock was held by persons with addresses within United States, established that mortgagee was citizen of United States within requirements of Ship Mortgage Act.—Collier Advertising Service v. As to oath Irregularity in enrollment of vessels belonging to corporation, in that ownership oath was made by vice president and was without specific written authority attested by corporate seal as required by statute, was not such as to invalidate ship mortgage.—Collier Advertising Service v. Hudson River Day Line, supra.

Enrollment in corporate name

Fact that vessels belonging to corporation were enrolled in corporate name did not invalidate ship mortgage, as statute providing that enrollments and licenses for vessels owned by any incorporated company may be issued in name of president or secretary of company was permissive only.—Collier Advertising Service v. Hudson River Day Line, supra.

Compliance not shown

Statute requiring mortgage covering vessel and other property to provide for separate discharge of such property by payment of specified "portion" of mortgage debt contemplated certain proportion of debt as it exists at particular time; and mortgage deed of trust securing bond issue amounting to one hundred seventy-five thousand dollars and covering three vessels, together with urban and rural lands, and conditionally authorizing release of vessels on paying seventy-five thousand dollars for one and ten thousand dollars for each of other two vessels and on paying one hundred thousand dollars for urban lands and thirty-five thousand dollars for rural lands, did not comply with statute requiring provision for separate discharge of nonmaritime property by payment of specified portion of mortgage debt, especially where debt had been reduced to ninety thousand dollars.—The Emma Giles, supra.

Protection of third persons

Statute requiring mortgage covering vessel and other property to provide for separate discharge of such property by payment of specified portion of mortgage debt was intended to insure validity of statutory extension of admiralty jurisdiction, and to protect third persons, such as prospective lienors.—The Emma Giles, supra.

Mortgage held not to include other property

Mortgages on vessels and all provide for the separate discharge of each vessel by payment of a portion of the mortgage indebtedness, but, if the mortgage does so provide, the amount of the portion to be paid must be indorsed on the documents of the vessel.[25] The provision of the statute requiring the indorsement on the ship's documents of provisions of the mortgage relating to other property included therein is directory, and the failure to make such indorsement as to other property pledged for the mortgage debt does not render the mortgage void.[26] A ship mortgage is valid, although it is executed pursuant to a prior bill of sale providing for a standard form of mortgage, given before the enactment of the statute;[27] and the agreement in the bill of sale to give a mortgage is not sufficient to constitute an existing equitable mortgage so as to render the statute inapplicable, within the provision that it is not applicable to any existing mortgage.[28]

Statutes providing that on the sale or transfer of a vessel an instrument in the nature of a bill of sale shall recite at length the certificate of registry have been held inapplicable to a mortgage of a ship.[29] It has, however, been held essential to the validity of a mortgage executed by the purchaser of a ship that his bill of sale be recorded in the office of the collector of customs.[30]

Reregistry. Under an act of congress that, when a registered vessel is sold she shall be registered anew, and that no mortgage shall be valid against third persons without actual notice, unless recorded in the office of the collector where such vessel is registered, a mortgage given by a buyer without reregistering the vessel is invalid as against an attaching creditor.[31] Any defect in the documentation of a ship existing prior to its sale does not affect a preferred ship mortgage where before sale the ship was not covered by the mortgage and on transfer to the purchaser and mortgagor the ship was registered anew.[32]

c. Delivery or Possession

Unless required by statute, immediate delivery of the vessel to the mortgagee, or a change of possession, is not essential to the validity of a mortgage thereon.

Unless required by statute,[33] a mortgage of a vessel, although unaccompanied by an immediate delivery and not followed by an actual change of possession, is not void if it is made to appear on the part of the mortgagee that the mortgage was made in good faith and without any intent to defraud purchasers or creditors.[34] The want of change of possession subjects the instrument prima facie to an imputation of fraud, which may be rebutted by proof of good faith.[35] If the vessel is at sea or ready to go to sea, a mortgage thereof will be good as against creditors or assignees in bankruptcy, if the muniments of title are transferred,[36] and possession of the vessel is taken by the mortgage as soon as possible.[37] A failure to change possession will not affect the mortgage where there is a sufficient reason for such failure,[38] as where an undivided share in a vessel is mortgaged,[39] or where by agreement in the mortgage an immediate voyage by her is contemplated to be made by the owner.[40]

Vessel in process of construction. Where a shipbuilder, before he commences building the vessel, enters into a contract by which he hypothecates the vessel to be built for advances, it is a valid mortgage or hypothecation of the builder's interest,[41] and gives a lien which attaches as the vessel comes into existence.[42] Such a mortgage or hypothecafreight earnings were held not to include "property other than a vessel" within Ship Mortgage Act providing that mortgage including "property other than a vessel" shall not be preferred mortgage unless separate discharge for such property is provided for, since earned freight is part of vessel, and there was no proof that freights had been applied to mortgages or released to mortgagor—The R Lenahan, D C Pa, 10 F Supp 497

Discharge payment should be a fixed proportion of the debt as it exists at any time rather than a fixed sum of money, and the release clause of the mortgage should be drawn accordingly—The Emma Giles, D.C. Md, 15 F.Supp. 502.

tion, without actual possession or delivery, is not available against a subsequent bona fide purchaser[43] or an attaching creditor.[44]

d. Construction and Operation

The rules governing construction of chattel mortgages ordinarily control in respect of a mortgage of a vessel.

The rules governing construction of chattel mortgages, as discussed in Chattel Mortgages §§ 104–129, ordinarily control in respect of the construction and operation of a mortgage of a vessel,[45] as with respect to the property covered by the terms of the mortgage.[46]

e. Priorities

In the absence of statutory provision according it a preferred status, a mortgage on a ship is postponed to maritime liens but comes ahead of the claims of general creditors. Under the provisions of the federal Ship Mortgage Act a mortgage on a vessel is accorded a preferred status.

Although, as discussed supra subdivision a of this section, a mortgage on a vessel is not a maritime contract, and although, as considered in Maritime Liens §§ 50–59, a mortgage must be postponed to maritime liens, even though subsequently created, such as liens for seamen's wages, as discussed in Seamen § 149, after the satisfaction of the maritime liens, a debt secured by a mortgage on the vessel will be paid before the debts of general creditors,[47] unless the mortgage is void by virtue of some statute.[48] A mortgage reciting that it is to secure a debt also secured by a bill of sale on another vessel is not necessarily inconsistent with the mortgagee's ownership of the other vessel,[49] and, where he conducts himself as owner, he cannot subsequently claim to be a mere lienholder as to moneys advanced for the purchase price and assert priority as such to insurance money on the vessel after its loss.[50] If the jurisdiction of admiralty has been properly invoked, a mortgage lacking the status of a preferred mortgage under the federal Ship Mortgage Act may nevertheless be given effect as a lien and accorded the legal priority to which it may be entitled.[51]

Under the federal Ship Mortage Act, 46 U.S.C.A. §§ 911–1014, a method is provided whereby a preferred status may be given to a mortgage on a vessel,[52] and the preferred mortgage is accorded the priority specified by the act,[53] the mortgage being accorded priority over all other claims against the vessel except preferred maritime liens enumerated by the statute, as discussed in Maritime Liens § 51 b. On the mortgagee's compliance with the requirements of the statute, a mortgage on a vessel has such preferred status,[54] even though the mortgagor may have failed to comply with certain statutory requirements,[55] and persons dealing with the vessel are affected with constructive notice thereof and are bound by its terms.[56] A provision of the act relating to priority of liens on the proceeds of a ship sold in admiralty in a suit to enforce a preferred mortgage is not limited to a suit brought expressly to enforce the mortgage, but applies as well to a suit brought by other lien claimants in which the mortgage also is enforced.[57] In order to enjoy a preferred status, the mortgage must comply with the requirements and conditions specified in the act,[58] and it is essential that the mortgagee comply with all requirements applicable to him.[59] A mortgagee's interest as a preferred mortgagee to a subsequent claim may be terminated by a surrender of the documents of the vessel, with the mortgagee's consent, with the approval of the shipping board.[60] Inadequacy of consideration may bar the right to a preferred mortgage.[61]

As between mortgages. In accordance with general rules, discussed in Chattel Mortgages §§ 294–296, separate mortgages on a vessel are entitled to priority according to their respective dates of record,[62] unless special equities exist by virtue of which a subsequent mortgage becomes entitled to priority,[63] as where the holder of the mortgage subsequent in date acquires it by assignment through a bona fide purchaser for value without notice.[64] Under an act of congress which provides that no mortgage shall be valid unless recorded in the manner and place required by the statute, the recording of a mortgage gives it a preference over a subsequent mortgage,[65] irrespective of any formalities required by a state statute to give effect to chattel mortgages.[66] A subsequent mortgagee who acts on the assumption that the validity of a prior mortgage is unquestioned and recites in his own subsequent mortgage that it is a second preferred mortgage subject to the lien of a prior mortgage is estopped to attack the validity of the prior mortgage,[67] and in any event minor irregularities in respect of the record of the prior mortgage will not destroy its status as a prior preferred mortgage.[68] On the other hand, it has been held that, where the holder of a subsequent recorded mortgage has, at the time, notice of a prior unrecorded mortgage, the recorded mortgage is postponed to the unrecorded mortgage.[69]

Insurance premiums While premiums for insurance benefiting only the mortgagee of a libeled ship may be added to the mortgage debt in accordance with the terms of the mortgage, such premiums will not, it has been held, be accorded precedence over other liens having priority over the mortgage debt,[70] and, where the insurance was taken out without knowledge of the marshal, the premiums will not be regarded as part of the costs taxable by the marshal.[71]

Pledgees of a ship, its tackle, and earned freight have claims prior to those who have investments in vessel venture.[72]

Tax lien. The lien of the mortgage has been held superior to a tax lien, at least where both liens are held by the federal government.[73]

Towage lien. A lien for towage taken necessarily and as part of pilotage service has been held superior to a ship's mortgage claim,[74] although an ordinary towage claim has been held inferior to a mortgage on the towed ship [75]

f. Rights and Liabilities of Mortgagee and Mortgagor

(1) In general
(2) Possession and right to possession
(3) Right to earnings
(4) Liability for supplies, repairs, and services
(5) Effect of sale or seizure of ship
(6) Foreclosure and sale
(7) Redemption

(1) In General

In some jurisdictions the mortgagee of a ship becomes vested with the legal title subject to the mortgagor's right of redemption, but in other jurisdictions title remains in the mortgagor and the mortgagee secures only a lien

In some jurisdictions, after the mortgage takes effect, the mortgagee of the vessel becomes the owner of the legal title to the vessel, subject to be defeated by the performance of the condition.[78] On default in the payment of the debt secured, the mortgagee's title becomes absolute as against the mortgagor,[79] and his right of possession perfect,[80] and the mortgagor has only an equity of redemption.[81]

In other jurisdictions, however, the legal title remains in the mortgagor, and the mortgagee does not become the owner of the vessel, but the mortgage is regarded as constituting a security only, and as merely creating a lien on the vessel.[82] The mortgagee has a beneficial interest in the vessel which may be attached by his creditors;[83] and, where the mortgagor and others interested are parties, the equity may be foreclosed, and the debt or interest subjected to the attaching creditor's claim.[84]

Right to sue for injury to ship. In some jurisdictions, if the mortgagor still retains his right of redemption, he may maintain an action for an injury to the vessel,[85] notwithstanding she is in the possession of the mortgagee who receives her earnings,[86] but it has also been held that the mortgagee, by virtue of his title, has, as between himself and the mortgagor, the right to receive and recover damages resulting from a collision to the mortgaged vessel,[87] although the mortgagor held the right to redeem at the time the collision occurred,[88] and that this rule is particularly applicable where the mortgagee's title has become absolute by foreclosure.[89] It has also been held that for the protection of his interest the mortgagee of a vessel may come in as colibelant in a libel filed by the owners against the offending vessel.[90]

Liability of titular owner. One in whose name title to a vessel stands, but who is not in possession of the vessel and does not control it, who executes a mortgage on it for the real owner and for the benefit of the vessel, merely because the title stands in his name, without any covenant personally to pay the mortgage debt, is not liable for the debt to the mortgagee.[91]

The assignee of a mortgage of a vessel takes it with all the rights and powers which were possessed by the mortgagee;[92] and no equities existing between several mortgagors will deprive the assignee of any of the usual remedies for the enforcement of the security.[93]

Withdrawal of trust fund. A mortgagor's right under a trust mortgage covering vessels under construction to withdraw collateral from a sinking fund to pay for new vessels or for permanent improvements to vessels does not give him authority to withdraw bonds to apply on the cost of a vessel mortgaged after it was completed and paid for.[94]

(2) Possession and Right to Possession

While in possession of his ship the mortgagor retains the rights and privileges of ownership, but, when the mortgagee takes possession, the latter is then regarded as the owner.

As long as the mortgagee of the ship does not take possession, even after default, the mortgagor, as the registered owner of the ship, retains all the rights and privileges of ownership,[95] and all transactions and contracts entered into by him are valid and binding so long as they do not impair the security of the mortgagee.[96] The mortgagor in possession may make any change, addition, or repairs on the vessel necessary and convenient for her preservation and use as a ship;[97] and, in such a case, old material, displaced by new, may be disposed of by the mortgagor as his property, unaffected by the mortgage;[98] but, if it is not disposed of, and is left on the vessel and passes into the possession of the mortgagee with the vessel, and is capable of being used in its ordinary navigation, it is within the operation of the mortgage and belongs to the mortgagee.[99] An unqualified sale by the mortgagor, not merely of his interest in the equity of redemption, but of the entire vessel for his own benefit, constitutes a wrongful conversion for which trover will lie by the mortgagee[1]

Where the mortgagee does take possession, he becomes the owner, and it is his duty to put the vessel, so far as may be, to some profitable use;[2] and on the other hand he may intervene and contest claims affecting his lien on the vessel.[3] The mortgagee is not personally liable for a contract made by the mortgagor, who is in possession operating the vessel,[4] even though the vessel is registered in the name of the mortgagee,[5] and the money received from the contract has been paid to the mortgagee in accordance with the terms of the mortgage,[6] and even though such money is procured by false representations, of which the mortgagee had no notice.[7]

Where a state statute precludes a mortgagee of a ship from taking possession of her on the mortgagor's breach of agreement unless such taking of possession is authorized by the express terms of the mortgage, a mere oral understanding of the parties is insufficient to constitute the essential authorization,[8] but nothing in such statute limits the right of the parties after execution of the mortgage to enter into an agreement, based on adequate consideration, relative to the mortgagee's taking possession of the ship in the event that the mortgagor fails to comply with his agreement, and under such a subsequent agreement the mortgagee may properly take possession on the mortgagor's failure to comply with his agreement.[9] By taking possession pursuant to a valid subsequent agreement the mortgagee does not waive its lien or right to foreclosure.[10]

(3) Right to Earnings

The mortgagor is entitled to all earnings of the ship which accrue while he is in possession and control, but on his taking possession the mortgagee becomes entitled to earnings then accruing.

If the mortgagee does not take possession of the vessel, he is not entitled to her earnings which accrue while the mortgagor is in possession and control;[11] but, if he takes possession, sufficient to terminate the mortgagor's possession and control of the vessel, and to assume the rights of ownership in himself,[12] he takes the right to all earnings then accruing,[13] and this right cannot be defeated or curtailed by an assignment of the freight by the shipowner.[14] The mortgagee in possession, however, is not entitled to earnings which have been received by the mortgagor, although for the voyage then current.[15]

Duty to account. Where an attempted foreclosure is avoided and where the mortgagee has been in possession and control of the vessel, he is chargeable with the net amounts which he has received as her earnings,[16] or which, by the exercise of due diligence, he ought to have received[17] As against the amount of such earnings he is entitled to be credited with compensation for services rendered in producing successful voyages and earnings,[18] notwithstanding he fraudulently foreclosed the mortgage, which foreclosure has been set aside[19] On the other hand, he is not entitled to credit for expenditures made, which do not constitute a part of the mortgage debt,[20] or which were not authorized by the mortgage.[21]

(4) Liability for Supplies, Repairs, and Services

Where the mortgagee is not in possession of the ship, liability for supplies, repairs, and services ordinarily rests on the mortgagor and not on the mortgagee.

It is well settled that ordinarily, where the mortgagee of a vessel does not have her in his possession or control, liability for supplies and repairs furnished on the order or at the request of the master or mortgagor is on the mortgagor,[22] and the mortgagee is not liable therefor,[23] and this rule applies, although the mortgagee holds the legal title under a bill of sale absolute on its face,[24] or is vested with the property by the mortgage,[25] and the vessel is registered or enrolled in his name,[26] and although the mortgagee subsequently takes possession.[27] The mortgagee, however, is liable for repairs, supplies, or services furnished while he is in possession and control of the vessel,[28] although his relation to the vessel was unknown to the creditor at the time the demand arose.[29] He is also liable for repairs and supplies, even though not in possession of the vessel, where he has adopted the risks and expenses of the voyage,[30] or has held himself out as the real owner of the vessel in such way as to lead persons to believe that the master or mortgagor was his agent authorized to make contracts concerning the vessel,[31] or where the supplies are furnished, or the repairs made, at his request,[32] or by the direction of someone authorized to contract on his behalf;[33] but neither the master nor the mortgagor has implied authority to represent him in this respect, if he is not in possession of the vessel, and holds his title only as collateral security.[34]

Expense of reconditioning ships after return by government. Where the United States requisitions vessels under an agreement with the owners and mortgagee giving it a lien for transportation charges superior to the mortgage lien, the government is not liable to the mortgagee's assignee for the expense of reconditioning the vessels after their return if such expense is less than the amount due the government for transportation charges;[35] and an assignee of a mortgage and of construction liens for repairs before the government's requisition of the ships may not, as the lienor's assignee, recover from the government the expense of reconditioning the vessels after their return, where the time of assignment of the liens is not shown.[36]

(5) Effect of Sale or Seizure of Ship

The claim of a mortgagee against the ship is lost by her sale pursuant to suit to enforce superior claims, but in such case the mortgagee's claim is transferred to the proceeds of sale in its regular order of priority.

36. U S.—U S. v Acme Operating Corporation, supra.

The claims of a mortgagee against the vessel are extinguished by a decree and sale of the vessel in a suit brought to enforce a superior claim or lien,[37] although the mortgagee fails to appear or refuses to submit his claims and interests to the decision of the court or to be bound by its decree.[38] His rights after such sale exist only against the proceeds of the sale,[39] in the order of priority to which he is entitled, under the rules considered supra subdivision e of this section; and this rule applies where the vessel is sold at the instance of attachment or execution creditors of the mortgagor.[40] The mortgagee's claim to the proceeds is not extinguished by the fact that he has become the purchaser of the vessel at a forced sale.[41] Where a vessel owned by a club is pledged to one of the members, as security for a loan advanced to pay the purchase money, and the treasurer sells the vessel for more than enough to pay such debt, he must account to the pledgee for the sum received.[42]

Effect of seizure of vessel for violation of law. Under the provision of the Ship Mortgage Act that the interest of the mortgagee shall not be terminated by the forfeiture of the vessel for any violation of any law of the United States, unless he participated therein, the rights of a mortgagee are protected on seizure of the vessel for illegal transportation of liquor in violation of the Prohibition Act, unless he authorized, consented, or conspired to effect the illegal use.[43] Even though the lien of the mortgage on a ship is lost under such statutory provision, the mortgagee may still maintain a personal action on the secured note if the debt and mortgage were bona fide.[44]

(6) Foreclosure and Sale

Except as varied by statutory provisions, questions as to foreclosure and sale under a mortgage of a vessel are ordinarily determined by the rules applicable to chattel mortgages.

Except to the extent that such foreclosure or sale is governed by special statutory provisions,[45] the rules governing the foreclosure and sale under chattel mortgages control in respect of mortgages of vessels,[46] as in connection with matters of pleading,[47] evidence,[48] and trial.[49] Where such power is contained in the mortgage, the mortgagee may sell the vessel on a default, in the payment of the debt secured.[50]

Counsel fees may be allowed a successful mortgagee in foreclosure proceedings brought in admiralty under the Ship Mortgage Act.[51]

Reasonable allowance
Indebtedness secured by preferred ship mortgage included a reasonable sum to be fixed by court as an attorney's fee for libelant's proctor in libel in rem against vessel to foreclose mortgage; and an attorney's fee of three hundred fifty dollars was reasonable, where amount of judgment was three thousand fifteen dollars and sixty-seven cents —The Home, D C.Wash., 65 F.Supp. 94.

Validity of provision for fees
Provisions of preferred ship mortgage were held to entitle mortgagee to allowance of fees of counsel in foreclosure proceedings from proceeds of foreclosure sales Such provision was valid and enforceable where it had been held valid in state of home port of vessel and place of delivery of mortgage and in state where suit was brought, in absence of definitely established rule of admiralty law to contrary —The John Jay, D.C Pa., 15 F.Supp. 937.

Discharge of mortgage. A judicial sale of the vessel free of lien effects a transfer of the lien from the ship to the proceeds of sale,[52] but, where such sale is for a price less than the discharge figure recited in the mortgage, it does not effect a discharge of such mortgage.[53]

Purchase and resale by mortgagee. Where the mortgagee purchased the vessel at the foreclosure sale and occupied the position of a trustee for the mortgagor in making a resale of it, in settling the accounts between the parties the mortgagor should be credited on his indebtedness with the full purchase price received on the resale, less necessary expenses and reasonable attorney's fees.[54]

Appointment of receiver Under the federal Ship Mortgage Act empowering the court to appoint a receiver and, in its discretion, to authorize him to operate the vessel, the court may do so on request of the United States as mortgagee, on the promise of the United States maritime commission to pay resultant losses, even though the court might have refused such a request if it had been made by a private enterprise as mortgagee.[55] Where receivers appointed by a court of equity validly possess a mortgaged ship and are operating her, and have issued and sold receiver's certificates, the consent of the equity court has been held essential to foreclosure of a preferred ship's mortgage under the federal Ship Mortgage Act [56]

Waiver and laches Any irregularities in a mortgage sale of a ship are waived by the mortgagor, where he confirms the sale and takes an option from the mortgagee, who has purchased at the sale, to repurchase [57] In order to determine whether the preferred status of a mortgage under the federal Ship Mortgage Act has been lost by waiver or laches, the court must look to the provisions of the act itself,[58] and the preferred status of the mortgage remains as long as the mortgage is unpaid unless lost by reason of provisions of the act itself [59] Failure of a mortgagee promptly to foreclose on maturity of the mortgage debt will not defeat his lien on the ship,[60] and, where the mortgagor keeps up payment of interest, even prolonged delay in instituting foreclosure proceedings after maturity of the debt will not constitute laches barring recovery.[61] Statutory provisions requiring the date of maturity of a ship mortgage to be entered on the records do not limit the time within which the security may be enforced.[62]

54. Ala—Murphy v. Merchants Nat. Bank of Mobile, 200 So. 894, 240 Ala. 688.

Conversion

A mortgagee bank in foreclosing under its first mortgage on a vessel rather than in making a private sale under a blank bill of sale given to bank by mortgagor did not commit a breach of trust, where bank found that the federal government had a judgment against mortgagor and that it had been recorded under state statutes, and sale of vessel by bank in a federal court, its purchase of vessel, and its resale thereof did not constitute conversion—Murphy v. Merchants Nat. Bank of Mobile, supra.

Interest in purchaser's business

Mortgagee was required to account to mortgagor for a sum received by him in addition to the resale price, which additional sum was in the nature of an interest in the purchaser's business, and mortgagee's acceptance of a less sum than the agreed value of such interest, without the consent of mortgagor, did not entitle mortgagee to a corresponding reduction in the credit which was allowable on mortgagor's indebtedness—Murphy v. Merchants Nat Bank of Mobile, supra.

Liability for interest

(1) Where mortgagee bank bought mortgaged vessel at foreclosure sale and resold vessel on credit, resale was at bank's risk, and, hence, interest charges after sale were not chargeable to mortgagor—Murphy v. Merchants Nat. Bank of Mobile, supra.

(2) "Delivery" of vessel to purchaser from mortgagee bank which had purchased vessel at foreclosure sale did not occur when vessel was required to be retained for improvements and repairs to make it seaworthy, but occurred when it was capable of being used in the shipping business, and it was from the date when the latter event occurred that interest should be calculated on purchase price as affecting mortgagor's indebtedness to bank—Murphy v Merchants Nat. Bank of Mobile, supra.

Rentals

Where conditioning of the foreclosed vessel postponed the time of actual delivery to the purchaser, the mortgagor was not entitled to credit on his indebtedness as for rentals before the date of actual delivery.—Murphy v. Merchants Nat. Bank of Mobile, supra.

(7) Redemption

Where, on default in payment, legal title to the mortgaged vessel has become vested in the mortgagee, thereafter the mortgagor has only the equitable right of redemption.

Where, on default in the payment of the debt secured by a mortgage on a vessel, the legal title to the vessel becomes vested in the mortgagee, thereafter the mortgagor, or anyone holding his title, has only the equitable right of redemption,[63] and the usual rules governing chattel mortgages apply with respect to the amount required to be paid in order to redeem.[64]

§ 25. Recording Conveyances and Mortgages

a. In general
b. As against creditors and purchasers
c Effect of recording
d. Renewal and refiling

a. In General

A conveyance or mortgage of a ship may be good as between the parties even though not recorded

As between the parties to the instrument, a sale of a vessel is ordinarily sufficient to pass title, although it is not recorded.[65] A mortgage also, although not recorded, is good as between the parties,[66] and against their assigns under bankrupt and insolvent systems, although not recorded until after their appointment.[67] These rules apply to cases arising under the federal recording acts.[68] Under the provisions of some statutes recordation is not essential to the validity of a mortgage of a ship or cargo at sea or abroad, if the mortgagee takes possession as soon as may be after its arrival in port.[69]

b. As against Creditors and Purchasers

(1) In general
(2) Under federal statutes
(3) Under state statutes

(1) In General

An unrecorded mortgage on a vessel is generally invalid as against creditors and bona fide purchasers from a mortgagor in possession.

As a general rule, an unrecorded mortgage is invalid as against creditors of the mortgagor,[70] or as against bona fide purchasers from the mortgagor in possession,[71] but this does not include one who purchases with notice of the prior mortgage,[72] unless he purchases from one who was a bona fide purchaser without notice.[73]

(2) Under Federal Statutes

(a) In general
(b) Vessels within statutes
(c) Place of record

(a) In General

Under the federal recording acts a conveyance or mortgage of a vessel must be recorded in order to be valid against any person other than the parties, their heirs and devisees, and persons having actual notice thereof.

Under statutory provisions sometimes referred to as the federal recording acts,[74] unless a conveyance or mortgage of a vessel subject to the acts is recorded as required by the laws of the United States, it will not be valid against any person other than the parties, their heirs and devisees, and persons having actual notice thereof;[75] but, where a conveyance or mortgage of such a vessel is recorded in compliance with the federal statutes, it is valid, even though not recorded as required by state laws.[76] The validity of the federal recording acts has been upheld,[77] and such acts are not repealed or modified by the subsequently enacted federal Ship

a junior security.—The Favorite, supra.

Mortgage Act.[78] Under the federal acts a subsequent bona fide purchaser or creditor of the original owner of the vessel is entitled to protection as against a prior sale,[79] an assignment for the benefit of creditors,[80] a gift,[81] or a mortgage[82] of the vessel, unless it has been recorded in compliance with the statute,[83] or unless such creditor or purchaser had actual notice of the transfer. A charter party is not a conveyance within the meaning of such statute and need not be recorded thereunder.[84] The statute, also, does not apply to conditional sales whereby the seller retains title until full payment[85]

As to persons with notice. The fact that the conveyance or mortgage has not been recorded as required by these statutes does not affect its validity as against a person who has actual notice thereof,[86] and it has been held that possession of the vessel by the prior transferee is sufficient notice of the mortgage or conveyance to him;[87] and, accordingly, the rights of one having a prior unrecorded conveyance of the vessel accompanied by possession have been held superior to those of one who derives his title through a subsequent unrecorded conveyance.[88]

Preferred status. A mortgage on a ship will not be accorded a preferred status under the federal Ship Mortgage Act if it is not recorded in compliance with statutory requirements.[89]

(b) Vessels within Statutes

The federal recording statutes are applicable only to vessels of the United States.

The federal recording acts apply only to vessels of the United States, that is, vessels which have been registered or enrolled under the laws of the United States at the time when the instrument is made.[90] If the vessel has been so registered or enrolled, it is subject to the recording laws of the United States,[91] which supersede any state law, pertaining to the recordation of such conveyance or mortgage, as far as it is inconsistent, therewith.[92] Without such registration or enrollment the vessel is not a vessel of the United States within the meaning of the statute,[93] and is governed, as to the recordation of a transfer of it, by state laws discussed infra subdivision b (3) of this section; and, accordingly, the recording of a conveyance or mortgage of such a vessel, under the federal statute, does not constitute constructive notice of the existence of such conveyance or mortgage,[94] and is of no effect against a person who is not a party to, or does not claim under, such conveyance or mortgage,[95] nor will recording a mortgage on an undocumented vessel, not a vessel of the United States, confer on such mortgage a preferred status.[96] A vessel which is enrolled, athough it is not required to be so, becomes a vessel of the United States within the meaning of the recording acts.[97]

A vessel in course of construction, and not yet registered or enrolled, is not a vessel within the meaning of the recording acts,[98] and a mortgage on such structure some time before its completion is not recordable,[99] even after it has been completed as a vessel and enrolled.[1]

The word "vessel," as used in the federal recording acts, includes every description of water craft or other artificial contrivance used, or capable of being used, as a means of transportation on water.[2]

tion. The provisions of the Ship Mortgage Act, to the effect that the documents of a vessel covered by a preferred mortgage cannot be surrendered without the approval of the shipping board and that the board shall refuse approval unless the mortgagee consents thereto, indicate an intention to protect a mortgagee if the mortgage has once been registered on a United States vessel, and to prevent a transfer of the vessel thereafter without the consent of the board,[3] and the mortgage does not lose its priority because of the fact that the vessel is thereafter resold and not redocumented in the new home port.[4] On the other hand, if the vessel is sold and title changed before the mortgage is made, there must be a new registration of the vessel before a valid mortgage can be properly made and recorded under the statute.[5]

Failure to record documents in proper sequence has been held not to invalidate preferred ship mortgages otherwise sufficient, as against the contention that the ships were not "vessels of the United States" when the mortgages were made because the mortgages were executed a few hours before the vessels were documented.[6]

(c) Place of Record

Under the federal statutes the recording of a conveyance or mortgage of a ship should be at her home port.

Under the federal Ship Mortgage Act, 46 U.S. C.A. § 921, providing for the recordation of the conveyance or mortgage "in the office of the collector of customs of the port of documentation of such vessel," as construed with the statute, 46 U.S. C.A. § 17, requiring all vessels to be registered at the port nearest to which the owner resides, the recording must be made in the district in which is the home port of the vessel, that is, the port nearest the owner's residence, in which the vessel has her permanent registry or enrollment,[7] and not at the port of the last temporary registry or enrollment when not such home port.[8] When, however, a registered vessel is sold to a resident of another state, and registered anew at the port of the new owner, and a mortgage taken for the purchase money, it, in order to have the status of a valid preferred mortgage, must be recorded in the office of the collector at the new port of registry.[9] The recording of the conveyance or mortgage elsewhere than at such home port is ineffectual as far as it constitutes notice to creditors or purchasers.[10]

Approval of commissioner of navigation. It has been held that the home port of a vessel can be designated only with the approval of the commissioner of navigation,[11] and that the recording of a mortgage in a port not so approved is insufficient to afford it a preferred status, even though the approval is subsequently secured and such port then becomes the home port of the vessel.[12] Other authority has held that, under the Home Port Act, 46 U.S C.A. § 1012, the owner of a ship may choose the home port of his vessel,[13] subject to approval of the commissioner of navigation as a condition subsequent rather than precedent,[14] and that a record of a bill of sale or mortgage in a home port as selected by the owner is valid notwithstanding the approval of the commissioner was not secured until a date subsequent to the recording.[15]

(3) Under State Statutes

A ship not registered or enrolled as a vessel of the United States is subject to state laws with respect to the registration of a conveyance or mortgage thereof.

Where a ship has not been registered or enrolled as a vessel of the United States, it is subject to state laws,[16] and a conveyance or mortgage thereof must be recorded in accordance with state laws;[17] and if, before the vessel is registered or enrolled, a mortgage is recorded agreeably to the laws of the state, such mortgage is valid as against creditors and a bona fide purchaser,[18] even after the vessel has been registered and enrolled.[19] After the vessel is registered or enrolled as a vessel of the United States, however, it becomes subject to the laws of the United States, as discussed supra subdivision b (2) of this section, and not to the registry laws of the state,[20] and a recording of a conveyance or mortgage thereof in accordance with the state laws is ineffectual to give it validity as against a bona fide purchaser or creditor.[21] A state statute as to filing of chattel mortgages is inapplicable to the mortgage of a vessel which has been recorded pursuant to the laws of the United States.[22]

Filing. Where a mortgagor's home and boat when in the water are in one township, but when his boat is in his boathouse, it is in a different township, a mortgage on the boat is properly filed in each township.[23]

c. Effect of Recording

A recording under the federal Ship Mortgage Act, as construed in the light of other provisions, is intended as notice to the whole world, and one proceeding without ascertaining whether or not there is a recorded encumbrance on the ship does so at his peril. Enrollment of a ship pursuant to the provisions of the federal Home Port Act nullifies all purported encumbrances theretofore executed except as provided in such act.

Under the recording provisions of the Ship Mortgage Act, as construed with the further provisions of such act, a recording pursuant to such statute is intended as notice to the entire world, and one dealing with the ship has the duty to ascertain whether there is any encumbrance, and, if he fails to do so, he proceeds at his peril.[24] Where, in compliance with the statute, a mortgage on a vessel is properly recorded in the customhouse, and a certified copy is placed among the ship's papers, ample notice is given to persons dealing with the vessel that there is a preferred mortgage on it,[25] and the mortgage, considered as a whole, is not invalidated as a preferred mortgage by failure of the collector to indorse it on the ship's papers, as provided by the statute.[26]

The enrollment of a vessel pursuant to the provisions of the Home Port Act, 46 U.S.C.A. § 1012, has the effect of nullifying all purported encumbrances executed prior to such enrollment except as provided in such act,[27] and the records of the collector of customs at the home port of the ship are both inclusive and exclusive,[28] so that one without actual knowledge of a prior mortgage recorded only under state laws is protected by his subsequently executed and recorded mortgage where the latter was recorded under the provisions of the federal statutes.[29] State statutes containing provisions for executing mortgages on personal property without a change of possession have been construed as designed to give the rules stated in the federal Home Port Act full operation and effect.[30]

Earlier statute. The earlier act of congress requiring the recordation of conveyances and mortgages of vessels, which preceded the recording provisions of the Ship Mortgage Act, was a mere registry act,[31] and a recording thereunder gave no more lien or other priority to mortgages and conveyances than they had before the passage of the act,[32] except a priority to recorded conveyances and mortgages, over mortgages and conveyances not recorded.[33] The recording did not affect the per-

Termination of lien of prior mortgage

Where chattel mortgage covering motorboat being constructed was recorded under state laws, but was not recorded in office of collector of customs of home port of vessel, and where, after motorboat had been enrolled and duly licensed, another, who had no actual knowledge of existence of prior mortgage, took a chattel mortgage which was recorded in office of collector of customs of home port of motorboat in accordance with federal statute, the rights of the subsequent mortgagee and his vendee were superior to rights of prior mortgagee, since the enrollment and licensing of the motorboat terminated as to the subsequent mortgagee the mortgage lien of the prior mortgagee.—Atlas Imperial Diesel Engine Co. v. Criscuolo, 89 P.2d 674, 32 Cal.App.2d 244, certiorari denied Criscuolo v. Sweins, 60 S.Ct. 295, 308 U.S. 620, 84 L.Ed. 517, rehearing denied 60 S.Ct. 382, 308 U.S. 639, 84 L.Ed. 531.

sonal liability of the owner,[34] or give a force or validity to a conveyance or mortgage which it had not by the law of the place where it was made and executed.[35] The recording act charged every person taking title with notice of all recorded conveyances or mortgages made by anyone in the chain of title while he held title, whether or not the recording of such conveyances then occurred.[36] The statute was no less effective in favor of an attaching creditor without notice than it was in favor of a purchaser.[37]

d. Renewal and Refiling

Under some statutes a ship mortgage must be refiled after a specified lapse of time in order to retain its validity against third persons.

Under some statutes a mortgage on certain vessels, in order to continue valid against creditors and subsequent purchasers, must be refiled before the expiration of a specified period of time,[38] and, if it is not so refiled, the mortgage ceases to be a lien as against a subsequent bona fide purchaser.[39] If it is refiled after the expiration of the specified period, the mortgage is revived as against subsequent creditors, purchasers, or mortgagees,[40] but is subject to the claims of purchasers and mortgagees whose rights accrued during the default,[41] and to the rights of creditors whose debts were contracted before the refiling,[42] and it is not necessary that such debts should have become liens by judgment or attachment before the refiling, if they have been made liens before the question arises.[43]

A reregistry of a vessel at a different port has been held not to require a rerecording of a mortgage which was duly recorded when made at the former port.[44]

III. CHARTERS

§ 26. Definitions and Distinctions

A charter party is a specific contract, by which the owners of a vessel let the entire vessel, or some principal part thereof, to another person, to be used by the latter in transportation for his own account, either under their charge or his.

A charter party is a specific form of contract which relates to vessels,[45] and it has often been called a "mercantile lease."[46] More fully defined, a charter party is a specific contract, by which the owners of a vessel let the entire vessel, or some principal part thereof, to another person, to be used by the latter in transportation for his own account, either under their charge or his.[47] It may be either an agreement by which the owner is to carry a cargo which the charterer agrees to provide or an agreement for the entire surrender of the vessel, by the owner to the charterer who hires it.[48]

§ 27. Who May Make Charter

A charter party may be closed directly by the principals, and the master has power to make a charter party in a foreign port where the vessel owners have no agent.

A charter party may be closed directly by the principals.[54] The master has power to make a charter party in a foreign port where the vessel owners have no agent,[55] if he cannot communicate readily with the owners,[56] but he may not do so to secure a creditor of the owner of the vessel.[57] A master, in the home port, cannot bind the owners personally, by a charter party, without authority for that purpose,[58] even though he is sailing the vessel on shares,[59] in the absence of such authority, it is essential to the validity of the charter party that the managing owner should ratify.[60]

The master cannot, by mere virtue of his office, bind his owners by a charter party under seal, so as to subject them to an action of covenant thereon,[61] even though he may have acted under previous parol authority[62] or the charter has been ratified by parol.[63]

Furthermore, it has been held that a master cannot confer on a ship broker as agent authority to make a charter, under circumstances such that, if the agreement were made by the master himself, it would not be a valid charter party.[64]

Part owner. The owners of the majority interest, in the legal control and possession of a vessel, may make a valid charter binding it and the charterer[65] and also minority owners,[66] at least where they owned their respective interests before and at the time of the execution of the contract.[67]

sufficiently definite and certain.[75] An agreement, however, is not invalidated by the fact that it is terminable at will.[76]

Formal requisites. A charter party does not require any particular form for its validity.[77] So, letters[78] or telegrams[79] exchanged between the parties may be equivalent to a charter party. The circumstance of the parties having named their agreement, a charter party does not make it one where it does not contain the essentials of such a contract.[80] No precise technical words are required[81]

Necessity of writing. A charter need not be in writing,[82] and it is held that it may be by parol,[83] or at least that provisions of a parol agreement of the same character may be valid and operate in the same manner as the provisions of a written charter party.[84] A government agency may enter into an agreement for the approval of a charter party[85]

b. Offer and Acceptance

The expressed intentions of the parties govern in determining whether there is a charter party, and the minds of the parties must meet without variance on any material point between the offer and acceptance.

The expressed intentions of the parties govern in determining whether there is a charter party,[86] and they are not allowed to be defeated by their unexpressed intentions or understandings.[87] As in other contracts, the minds of the parties must meet without variance on any material point between the offer and acceptance[88] If there is any part of it in regard to which the minds of the parties have not met, the entire instrument is a nullity as to all its clauses[89] Thus, an acceptance that varies from the offer cannot be deemed an assent to the proposition for a charter party to which it is sent in reply,[90] but it is to be classed as an independent proposal,[91] which counterproposal, in turn, in order to become a contract of charter party, would have to be accepted by the first offerer[92]

Where the attempted acceptance is ineffectual to give rise to a valid charter because it varies from the terms proposed in the offer, such a defective acceptance, not amounting to, or designed as, a counteroffer, does not destroy the existence of the offer so as to render it thereafter unavailable as the basis of a charter party on a further acceptance which corresponds with the offer,[93] at least where the inoperative acceptance was designed by the offeree to accord with, and be an agreement to, the offer,[94] and if, after an invalid acceptance but before the termination or withdrawal of the offer, the offeree expresses his assent by an acceptance complying with the terms of the offer, there is a sufficient manifestation of assent for the existence of a valid charter party.[95] Such subsequent acceptance is sufficient for this purpose, although it is made orally and although the offer and the invalid prior acceptance have both been in writing.[96] Insertion of a separable and independent clause, not of the essence of the contract, into a charter party by mistake has been held insufficient to sustain the contention that no valid charter party has in fact ever been entered into.[97]

Negotiations and preliminary transactions. Mere willingness of the parties to enter into a charter party is not enough to constitute such a contract.[98] With charter parties, as with other contracts, the test as to whether a paper is a contract or an agreement to make a contract depends on whether there is embodied within the paper everything which the parties may have agreed to do, the other requisites to a contract being present.[99] The fact that the parties intend to express their agreement in a more formal instrument will not preclude it from constituting a present charter[1] unless there is a definite understanding of the parties to the contrary.[2] So, the fact that the charter is executory in some of its requirements does not render it incomplete so as to preclude it from being a "contract" as distinguished from a "preliminary agreement."[3] When negotiations are by letters, whether they have resulted in a completed contract or are merely incidental to the making of a future contract is often a difficult question[4] and is to be determined by the intention of the parties.[5]

Conditional agreement. Where the assent of a party to a proposed charter party is conditional only, and the condition is never fulfilled and never waived, such imperfect assent is insufficient for the creation of a charter party.[6] Thus, where the assent of the owner is expressly conditioned on the responsibility of a guarantor furnished by the charterer, the charterer has no valid charter which he can enforce against the owner if the guarantor turns out to be irresponsible,[7] and, where the owner's consent is conditioned on the furnishing of a surety by the charterer, and no surety is furnished, no charter party results.[8] The mere fact, however, that the owner knows that the charterer intends to transfer his charter rights to third persons with whom he is bargaining does not make the charter conditional on the successful consummation of the intended transfer where it is not expressly so provided,[9] the agreement under such circumstances is a valid charter party from the time of execution, and not a mere memorandum conditioned on the success of another transaction.[10]

Where the contract for a charter party is conditional, and the specified condition occurs, the contract remains thereafter as if no condition had ever been stipulated;[11] if no time is stipulated within which the condition shall be satisfied, it is sufficient to make the charter party absolute that it happens within a reasonable time after the agreement is made.[12] Where the condition is not one which is precedent to the existence of a charter party but is only one which is precedent to the existence of any obligation on the part of one of the parties to a charter already agreed to, the failure of such a condition is not sufficient to prevent the existence of a valid charter party.[13]

Waiver and estoppel. In the absence of some statutory limitation or considerations of an accepted public policy, the parties to a charter may include such waiver provisions as may constitute their bargain.[14] The parties to a proposed charter party may, by their acts and conduct manifesting assent, bind themselves so that the objection of an absence of the assent requisite to the existence of a valid charter party is no longer available to them;[15] thus the delivery of a vessel by the owner to the charterer may amount, in legal effect, to the adoption by the owner of the existing charter party,[16] and, conversely, the delivery and receipt of the ship have been held to constitute at least a technical acceptance by the charterer of the terms of the charter as they are expressed.[17] In order, however, for one of the parties to a proposed charter party to be held to have waived a variation, and agreed to a substitution proposed by the other party, it must appear that he knew of it.[18] Although the charter contract is not signed in behalf of the ship or her owners, it is binding on both parties, if it has been delivered to, and accepted by, them, and the ship has entered on its performance.[19] Where an agreement by the charterer to save the owner from any loss is conditional, but the owner refuses to recognize any right under the charter, the owner cannot recover on the conditional agreement.[20]

§ 29. Charters by Agents or Brokers

a. In general
b. Commissions or other compensation

a. In General

One may be bound by a charter party entered into by his agent within the scope of his authority. The general rules of agency apply with respect to the personal liability of the broker or agent.

In the absence of ratification, one person is not bound by a charter party entered into by another without authority from him,[21] or in excess of his authority.[22] Conversely, one may be bound by a contract entered into by his agent within the scope of his authority.[23] A broker's authority to effect charters depends on his special instructions at that particular time,[24] and may be at any moment withdrawn.[25] Authority to enter into a charter party need not be conferred by a specialty,[26] or by any other particular form of instrument.[27]

Where no limitation is placed on the manner in which the agent's authority to charter is to be exercised, it may be exercised in any way appropriate to carrying the authority into effect.[28] An agent to whom only limited and special authority to enter into a charter party is given cannot confer on a subagent for that purpose a broad discretionary power so as to bind the principal to a charter or other contract which the agent himself was not authorized to enter into.[29] Matters with respect to the agent's authority,[30] and those with respect to ratification by the principal,[31] are governed by the law of the place where the authority has been conferred or where the conduct asserted as a ratification took place rather than by the law of the place where the charter party agreement, if any, was executed. Under the particular circumstances, a cargo owner may act as an agent.[32]

Ratification of unauthorized charter. An unauthorized charter may be ratified by the person whom it is sought to bind,[33] as by failure to disaffirm it within a reasonable time after knowledge,[34] and in order that there may be ratification, it must be with full and correct information as to the facts.[35]

Personal liability of agent or broker on charter party. The general rules of agency apply with respect to the personal liability of the broker or agent on the charter party, as, for example, in the case of the absence of a real principal,[36] or in the case of an undisclosed agency or principal.[37] So the general rules apply in the determination of whether a charter is so executed by a broker or agent as to impose personal liability on him.[38]

b. Commissions or Other Compensation

In the absence of an agreement to the contrary commissions of a ship broker for procuring a charter are payable as soon as the charter is effected.

In the absence of an agreement to the contrary, commissions of a ship broker for procuring a charter are payable as soon as the charter is effected,[39] and his rights thereto do not depend on the performance of the contract,[40] or his right to a commission is not defeated by the loss of the ship,[41] by the fact that the charter is annulled by reason of war,[42] or by the fact that the original charter is canceled by the parties thereto.[43] Unless there is a valid and binding custom to the contrary, the fact that a charter is not in fact executed will not preclude recovery by the broker of his compensation where he has performed his duties in bringing the parties together and they have agreed on the terms of the contract,[44] but he is not entitled to such a recovery where the transactions between the owners and charterer are merely negotiations looking to a contract.[45] An agreement by an owner to pay a broker commissions for obtaining a charter for his vessel from the government is not void as being a contract against public policy.[46]

A broker cannot act as agent for both parties to the transaction so as to be entitled to pay for his services from each one unless both parties understand his position and expressly agree to such payments,[47] except that in some ports by usage when negotiation is closed the shipowners are liable to the broker for a fixed commission for bringing the parties together, although the broker, in initiating action looking to a charter party, was to be regarded as the agent of the charterer rather than of the owner.[48] A shipping broker has no lien on a vessel, in admiralty, for services in procuring a charter party.[49]

Since he is not a party to the contract, the extent of the broker's compensation is not to be determined by the stipulations in the charter party with respect thereto.[50] If the broker's contract with his principal entitles him to perform certain services and collect certain compensation in addition to the commission for procuring the charter, the failure to set out the full terms of their agreement in the charter party does not defeat the broker's right to claim under the agreement actually made by him with the principal,[51] and this is true, even though there are stipulations in the charter party with respect to the services and the compensation of the broker.[52] Where brokerage is to be determined by the amount of the vessel's earnings, the whole earnings of the vessel under the charter should form the basis for estimating the broker's compensation.[53] Where the amount of commission is determinable on the basis of a percentage of the freight to be earned, or the cargo to be carried in a charter for a specific voyage, the commissions are to be estimated not by the ultimate profits actually derived from the adventure, but by what they might be if it should prove successful,[54] that is, if the contemplated voyage were performed with the full contemplated cargo.[55]

The mere fact that the charter party recites that the broker procuring the original charter shall be entitled to a commission in the event of any continuation or extension by the parties does not give him an enforceable right thereto, as he is no party to the contract,[56] and even should such a promise be made him, he would not be entitled to recover commissions for the extension of the charter unless the promise was made under such circumstances as to constitute a binding contract,[57] the absence of any mutuality of obligation being sufficient to prevent the broker from such recovery.[58] Furthermore, although a binding contract for commission in the event of the extension or continuation of the charter is made, the broker is not entitled to a commission on a new charter, incorporating new provisions and made directly between shipowner and charterer, without any acts whatever by the broker during the negotiations,[59] the contractual provision for commission in the event of extension or continuation is not operative where there is a new negotiation,[60] even though the parties, the subject matter, and the hire remain unchanged.[61] The broker's right to compensation is not affected by a modification of charter provisions by the agreement of the parties.[62]

Compensation of subagents or persons aiding broker. Rights as to commissions of subagents, employed by the brokers, for the chartering of a vessel, are controlled by the terms of the actual contract which the brokers had made with their principal.[63] A broker employed to procure a charter party may recover the whole commission in his own name, although he is bound to pay over a portion to others who have aided in procuring such charter.[64]

§ 30. Subcharters and Assignments of Charters

a. Subcharters
b Assignments of charters

a. Subcharters

In the absence of prohibitions in the original charter, a charterer may execute a subcharter which is an independent contract.

In the absence of prohibitions in the original charter party, a charterer may execute a subcharter.[65] A subcharter is not merely an equitable assignment of the first charter,[66] even though it recites that it is a recharter,[67] but it is an independent contract between the charterer and the subcharterer[68] and it is, in the absence of some specific reference, in no way connected with the original charter except as regards the determination of the charterer's right to subcharter.[69] It does not create any contractual relationship between the subcharterer and the owner,[70] even though on the same terms as the original charter,[71] and no liability, based on such a relationship, can be asserted against the subcharterer.[72] The subcharterer's knowledge that the charterers had chartered the vessel from the owners does not alter the status of the parties[73] or release the charterers from the obligations which, by their charter party with the subcharterers, they voluntarily assumed.[74] The expression in the subcharter of obligations which the law would otherwise imply does not destroy the rights of the subcharterer to enforce such obligations.[75] The relation of bailor and bailee may exist between the owner of the vessel and the subcharterer,[76] or the subcharterer may act as agent for the owner.[77]

Liability under port bills of lading
A subcharterer has been held not liable under port bills of lading for loss of goods where the owner of the ship was the carrier and the bills of lading were signed by the subcharterer as agent for the owner —The Iristo, D C N.Y., 43 F Supp. 29, affirmed, C.C.A., Middleton & Co (Canada) Limited v Ocean Dominion S. S. Corp, 137 F.2d 619, certiorari denied 64 S Ct. 432, 320 U.S. 802, 88 L.Ed 484.

The owner owes the subcharterer the duty not to cause damage to the subcharterer's property by the negligent use of the vessel,[78] and he owes the duty of exercising reasonable care to have the vessel safe or seaworthy,[79] and will be responsible for the negligent failure of the master of the vessel to ascertain its seaworthiness.[80] The fact of suit by the subcharterer against the owner for unseaworthiness of the vessel has been held not a good defense to the charterer against a suit brought against him by the subcharterer on his agreement to furnish a seaworthy vessel,[81] at least where the claim is not shown to have been reduced to judgment.[82] The subcharterer, where in operation and control of the vessel, is primarily[83] liable for injuries resulting from the defective condition of the vessel[84] to an invitee of the subcharterer[85] but not to a mere licensee,[86] and is subjected to the same liability as though it were the owner of the vessel[87]

A repudiation of a subcharter contract does not constitute a breach of the subcharter unless the subcharterer elects to treat it as such.[88] Where the vessel is under separate charters for successive periods to different charterers, the breach of a subcharter, executed under one of such charters, may render the subcharterer primarily liable, and his charterer and the owner secondarily liable in the order stated.[89] When a subcharter is given, the master is the charterer's agent, in dealing with the subcharterer, only within the terms of the original charter;[90] as to any further dealings with the subcharterer respecting the vessel, he acts for the owner.[91] Where the master is employed and paid by the charterer, the charterer and not the subcharterer will be responsible for injuries resulting from the master's acts and negligence.[92]

Notice to, and assent of, owner to subcharter. Where the charter party gives the charterers the option of subletting the vessel on giving notice to the owner, it has been held that the mere fact that the subcharterer paid the first month's charter hire by its own check was not sufficient to amount to notice to the owner.[93] Such a provision in the charter party does not render it necessary for the charterer to give notice where it enters into a mere contract of affreightment not constituting a charter of the vessel,[94] and it has been held that a subcharter, for this purpose, must be such a charter as amounts to a demise of the vessel so as to make the subcharterer the owner pro hac vice[95] Where the charterer does give notice and the owner assents to the subcharter, the condition is fully met,[96] no particular form of assent to the subcharter is required where not stipulated for by contract,[97] mere silence being sufficient for the purpose if the circumstances are such that it indicates assent to the proposed subcharter.[98]

subcharter, vary his preëxisting obligation to the owner[99] The subcharterer can get no greater title or control over the ship than the original charterer,[1] but the subcharter may give to a subcharterer against the charterer greater rights than the charterer possessed against the owner.[2] The fact that payment is arranged to be made by the subcharterer directly to the owner does not enlarge the rights of the former.[3] Such payment does not suffice to raise a waiver or estoppel against the owner so as to prevent his assertion of the limitations and conditions in the original charter party; for that purpose, the essentials required for estoppel or waiver generally must be present.[4]

Effect of reference to charter. Where a subcharter specifies its terms in part and provides that all other conditions shall be as per charter party, the charterer by that reference assumes, in favor of the subcharterer, to carry out all the covenants therein contained on the part of the owners.[5] Reference in the subcharter to the charter, for the purpose of showing the charterer's special title and authority to let the vessel to the subcharterers, does not afford a ground on which the charterers can avoid their liability for a failure to fulfill the covenants and conditions of their contract[6] A charterer who, having given a subcharter which was expressly made subject to the charter party, subsequently misinforms the subcharterer when the latter inquires as to the terms of the prior instrument, may, if the other elements of estoppel exist, estop himself to deny that the terms of the charter party are as he has represented them.[7]

Liability of vessel. Where the original charter is of such a character as to constitute the charterer the owner pro hac vice, a subcharter in the nature of a contract of affreightment binds the vessel to the obligations arising therefrom,[8] where a bill of lading for goods shipped under the subcharter is signed and delivered to the subcharterer by one having authority to do so,[9] and even where there is no bill of lading.[10] Furthermore, this is true, even though the charter party expressly forbids the charterer to subject the vessel to liens, at least where the subcharterer is not aware but that the charterer is the owner, although he has used due diligence to discover the ownership.[11] Even though the charter operates in the manner stated, however, the vessel is not liable to a subcharterer for loss or injury caused solely by the conduct of the charterer[12] The negligence of the master as agent of a bareboat charterer binds the vessel in rem for losses resulting to the subcharterer.[13] Where the negligence proximately causing the loss of a vessel is that of the subcharterer, the subcharterer is primarily liable and the vessel is secondarily liable in rem for the loss of cargo.[14]

b. Assignments of Charters

A charterer may assign the original charter, unless some restriction is stipulated.

A charterer may assign the original charter,[15] unless some restriction is stipulated.[16] The obligations and rights of the parties, in the event of an assignment of the charter, are as defined in the charter party and in the agreement for an assignment.[17] A valid assignment of an entire charter

S. v. Palmer & Parker Co., supra.

Reserved lien of owner

Charterer of vessel, with option to purchase on ten days' written notice, which was not given, was not "purchaser in possession," so as to entitle assignee of charter party to override owner's reserved lien on subfreights. —U. S. v. Palmer & Parker Co., supra.

renders the assignee the entire owner of the charter rights from the time of assignment.[18] The owner may withdraw the vessel from the service of the assignee of the charterer where the assignee has failed in the performance of duties regarding the vessel on which the charter rights are conditioned.[19] An attempted assignment incapable of operating as an assignment may, under some circumstances, give rise to a transaction in the nature of a subcharter.[20]

Consideration. Where a charter is assigned, in consideration of a certain sum of money, the assignment of the charter constitutes the consideration for the assignee's promise of payment on account of such assignment,[21] and the assignee's promise to pay constitutes a present liability on his part.[22] The fact that payment is to be postponed until after the clearance of the vessel does not make such payment a condition precedent to the assignee's obligation to pay,[23] and payment may be enforced, even though the vessel does not clear the port, after a reasonable time.[24] Furthermore, even should the circumstances be such that clearance was a condition precedent to payment, the assignee's waiver thereof by accepting a settlement with the owner in lieu of the voyage stipulated by the charter entitles the assignor to sue for and recover the sum appointed as the consideration for the assignment.[25]

Damages. Where the charterer's assignee refuses to accept delivery of the vessel or to perform his obligations, the charterer's recovery is limited to such damages as he himself has sustained by reason of the assignee's breach,[26] and he cannot recover damages for the injury sustained by the master or the owner unless their claim has been directly assigned to him or unless he has satisfied a judgment obtained by them against him based on the assignee's breach.[27]

§ 31. Modification and Termination of Charter

a. Modification
b. Cancellation or rescission
c. Frustration

a. Modification

A charter party may be modified by a subsequent agreement, the assent of the parties being necessary.

A charter party may be modified by a subsequent agreement,[28] the assent of the parties being necessary.[29] Except as modified, the provisions of the original charter continue,[30] but the original meaning and effect of the modified provisions become immaterial.[31] Custom cannot vary the terms of the contract.[32] The Harter Act, 46 U.S.C.A. § 190 et seq, does not affect the rights of parties under a time charter party.[33]

The validity of the modification does not depend on the charter's hire having been paid, where the charterer was under no duty to pay the hire prior to the modification.[34] Likewise, it has been held that the fact that, at the time of the chartering of a ship for a voyage, she was technically under a time charter to another charterer, does not preclude the owner from making an agreement with the second charterer for modification of the subsequent charter party, where the owner had the right to declare the time charter forfeited, and it was in fact so treated by all the parties,[35] particularly when the time charterers do in fact know of, and acquiesce in, the modification.[36] A modification of a charter, contingent on the determination of the validity of an attempted cancellation of the charter party and without prejudice to the rights of the parties, should the attempted cancellation be inoperative, is of no effect in the event that the determination is against the validity of the cancellation, in which case the rights of the parties remain as they were under the charter party without any change by reason of the altered terms in the contingent modification.[37]

Power to assent to modification. The master of the vessel cannot vary the terms of the charter.[38] Thus, where a ship has been chartered by the owners, the master cannot effectually agree to change her cargo[39] or to alter the amount of freight to be paid or the manner of payment,[40] or release the owner's rights to security for payment.[41]

A like rule has been applied to attempted modification by an agent of the charterer whose whole authority is to fulfill the terms of the charter in behalf of his principal.[42] The agent of a cargo owner, not representing or connected with the charterer, cannot assent to a variation of the ship's duties under the charter party so as to bind the charterer to the modification.[43] Where several unite as charterers to charter a ship in common, the owners may contract with the several shippers, varying or annulling the charter party in relation to their respective parts of the cargo.[44] A broker's authority to vary charters depends on his special instructions at that particular time,[45] and may be at any moment withdrawn.[46]

b. Cancellation or Rescission

(1) In general

(2) Exercise of right to cancel or rescind

(1) In General

The charter party may be canceled by a subsequent agreement of the parties, or it may be terminated by one party in accordance with an option so to terminate given by the charter or because of a breach of condition.

The charter party may be canceled by a subsequent agreement of the parties.[47] If the charterer voluntarily surrenders the vessel, and the owner assents to the surrender, the transaction amounts to a surrender of the charter party, and the charterer may not subsequently claim possession of the vessel thereunder.[48] It has been held that it is not within the power of a master to release the charterer from his contract to the owner, as long as the contract is in force;[49] and the same rule applies to an agent of the charterer whose whole authority is to fulfill the terms of the charter in behalf of his principal.[50] A broker who, as agent of the owner of the ship, has authority to charter the ship has no right to abrogate the charter without the consent of his principal.[51]

Special instructions

A ship broker's authority to rescind charters depends on his special instructions at that particular time and may be at any moment withdrawn.—The Atlanta, supra.

Ratification of cancellation

(1) Where ship broker informed owner of steamship that broker was "dropping" the charter of the ship, and owner instructed broker to refuse to cancel the charter and that it wished to continue the charter, statements did not amount to ratification or authorization of the cancellation of the charter by the broker, although broker was authorized to do what the broker thought best.—The Atlanta, supra

(2) Knowledge of owner of ship that charterers had dropped the charter was not sufficient of itself for a ratification by the owner of ship broker's action in rescinding the charter.—The Atlanta, supra

(3) Where charterers of steamship, on condition of rescission of charter, offered to advance drydocking costs and to make certain advances to keep the ship moving, and owner of ship accepted such benefits from the charterers, owner of ship ratified ship

Assent to cancellation of the charter party by one of several joint charterers, it has been held, may be binding on the others.[52]

The commencement of war may excuse performance of the charter.[53] The terms and undertakings of the charter party may be such that a declaration of war will amount to a cancellation of the charter party,[54] in which case the release must be mutual and not optional with one party alone.[55]

Options in charter. The parties may, by provisions of the charter party, agree that, at discretion or for causes stipulated therein, the forfeiture of the charter may be declared,[56] and, when the party to whom the right to annul is given exercises the right in accordance with the charter provisions, such action terminates the charter.[57] In order that the right of cancellation by virtue of an option may be exercised, the option agreement providing for that right must be valid and enforceable.[58] The refusal to exercise prematurely an option to cancel the charter does not justify the other party in canceling it, and such an attempted repudiation is inoperative as a cancellation.[59]

The expession of a particular contingency in the charter party as affording an option of cancellation to the charterer, it has been held, indicates an intention of the parties that matters which would constitute conditions in the contract justifying repudiation, in the absence of any express declaration, are not to be so treated;[60] and, in such a situation, the charterer's option to repudiate has been confined to the contingency specifically provided for, and the right to cancel denied where its exercise was based on a disregard by the owner of an asserted condition precedent.[61] However, if the charterer is given an absolute option to terminate the charter party at any time on the giving of notice to that effect for a certain length of time beforehand, the operation of stipulations in the contract as conditions giving rise to a right of repudiation is not affected by such an option not dependent for its exercise on any contingency;[62] and the charterer may cancel the charter for default of the owner as to such conditions without giving the notice required for the exercise of the contractual option to cancel.[63]

Breach or failure of condition. A failure of a condition precedent may constitute good grounds for the cancellation of the contract.[64] Thus, if the owner of a vessel makes a warranty in certain particulars respecting the ship or the voyage, intended as a substantive part of the contract, the warranty constitutes a condition on the failure of which the charterers may repudiate the contract,[65] and, conversely, the failure of the hirer to fulfill his part of the agreement will justify the owner in disregarding the agreement and seeking other employbroker's unauthorized conduct in rescinding the charter.—The Atlanta, supra

Option to purchase

Damages for breach of voyage charter party

A time charterer could not recover from voyage charter damages resulting from cancellation of time charter because of loss of subsequent cargo on ground that voyage charterer's failure to discharge vessel within a reasonable time caused loss of subsequent cargo, where captain failed to obtain a full crew for two weeks after discharge was completed, and charter was not canceled until four or five days after date when vessel could have left port had captain been able to obtain a full crew.—Continental Grain Co. v. Armour Fertilizer Works, D.C.N.Y., 22 F.Supp. 49

Absence of conditions from contract

A party to a charter party contract for a foreign vessel could not complain that the contract being contingent on approval of foreign government, such government was in effect a party to contract and that its withdrawal of approval of contract acted as a cancellation thereof, where contract did not contain conditions respecting such matter.—The Laurent Meeus, D.C.Cal., 43 F.Supp. 807, modified on other grounds, C.C.A., Mitsubishi Shoji Kaisha, Limited v. ment.[66] The charterer may cancel the charter for the failure on the part of the shipowner to tender the vessel or have it ready for loading at the time and place specified in the charter.[67] In order to justify the rescission or repudiation of a charter party for breach of a condition, the character of the breach must be such as to defeat the purpose of the contract;[68] the breach of an independent and separate covenant, in a charter party, going only to a part of the consideration and compensable in damages,[69] or a mere default which is not recognized by rules of law or by the particular agreement of the parties as constituting a cause for cancellation,[70] will not justify a repudiation of the charter by one of the parties without the assent of the other.

(2) Exercise of Right to Cancel or Rescind

The statements and conduct of a party, in order to amount to a cancellation of the contract and to be attended by the legal consequences proper to a cancellation, must amount to a refusal to accept the vessel or to treat the charter party as being in operation.

The statements and conduct of a party, in order to amount to a cancellation of the contract and to be attended by the legal consequences proper to a cancellation, must amount to a refusal to accept the vessel or to treat the charter party as being in operation.[71] A chartering of a vessel, by the owners, on the default of the charterer in not furnishing the cargo, which is for the benefit of all concerned, is not a rescission of the contract discharging the freighter from liability.[72] It has been held that, although a charter party is determinable at will, yet this right is subject to the qualification that it cannot be rescinded while the vessel is actually employed in business pursuant to the charter,[73] and that such a charter is an absolute and indefeasible hiring of the vessel for every voyage undertaken until notice given by the party at whose will the charter is to run of his intention to discontinue it.[74] Where a shipowner accedes to the repudiation of the charter party, he is not entitled to damages by reason of the charterer's failure to accept a vessel tendered thereafter.[75]

An attempted cancellation, under a charter provision giving an option to cancel, in order to be valid must be made in pursuance of the agreement on which the right to cancel rests.[76] If the option of cancellation is limited or conditioned by the charter party provisions creating it, the limitations and conditions placed on it must be satisfied by the party electing to cancel in order that his repudiation may be effective to terminate the charter.[77] Where the parties agree in the charter party that the giving of certain certificates shall be conclusive evidence that the contingency on which the option rests does not exist, the presentation of such certificates concludes the party to whom the option has been given in the absence of fraud.[78]

Where the party aggrieved by breach of the charter party gives no indication of any intention to treat the breach as a termination of the charter party, such party cannot at a subsequent time avail himself of that breach as a basis for cancellation.[79] An attempted cancellation, under a charter provision

Delay

Where minor breakdown of machinery of motor vessel within fifteen minutes of delivery to charterer caused two and one-half days delay in course of twelve-months time charter, delay was not so substantial as to frustrate purpose of charter or to justify charterer's repudiation, and alleged fact that, if vessel had not been tendered until an hour later, clause in charter authorizing cancellation would have become operative did not authorize cancellation by charterer.—Aaby v. giving an option to cancel, must be declared promptly and within a reasonable time after cause arises in order to prevent a waiver.[80] Where the owner is given the option to rescind for default in payment of the charter hire, due periodically, his conduct in repeatedly accepting payment after the due date constitutes a waiver of his right of rescission so as to suspend its future operation,[81] except in the event of a general warning that strict payment will thereafter be insisted on,[82] or an actual demand followed by refusal or failure to pay,[83] but the owner's acceptance of the hire at a time subsequent to the time of demand and refusal does not affect his right of rescission,[84] in the absence of a waiver of his right to insist on cancellation.[85]

c. Frustration

The mere fact that performance of a charter party becomes impossible by reason of some occurrence subsequent to execution does not put an end to the agreement, but, where it appears from the charter that the parties contemplated that its fulfillment would be dependent on the continuing existence of certain things or conditions, the failure of the implied condition without the fault of either party terminates the charter party.

The mere fact that performance of a charter party becomes impossible by reason of some occurrence subsequent to execution does not put an end to the agreement,[86] but, if there is in the nature of the contract a condition relieving the parties from the obligation of performance, as where it appears from the charter that the parties contemplated that its fulfillment would be dependent on the continuing existence of certain things or conditions, the failure of the implied condition without the fault of either party terminates the charter party.[87] If the charter party is completely frustrated by requisition by the government, the rights and obligations of both parties are ended.[88] Whether the requisition frustrates the contract is a question depending on the extent of the interference considered in connection with the charter provisions[89]

A requisition for a definite time, materially less than the unexpired period of the charter, works a mere interruption and not a frustration,[90] a requisition for a definite time extending beyond the unexpired period of the charter contract works a complete frustration.[91] When the requisition is for an indefinite period, if a consideration of all the circumstances existing at the time of the requisition leads to the conclusion that it will probably continue beyond the charter period, then the charter is frustrated and the obligations under it terminated,[92] if, on the other hand, the circumstances indicate probable release of the vessel for a substantial time before the expiration of the charter period, the charter contract is not terminated.[93] In weighing this issue of probability the courts take into consideration not only the conditions existing at the time of the requisition, but the real duration of the requisition.[94]

The doctrine of termination by frustration is not confined to cases of requisition,[95] but similar principles have been held to prevail where the frustration of the adventure is caused by detention by a government.[96] The only substantial distinction between a voyage charter and a time charter, on the issue of frustration, is that in the former the embargo detention or requisition in most cases is certain to continue beyond the expected termination

a. What Law Governs

As a general rule, the intention of the parties controls as to the law governing the interpretation of charter parties.

As a general rule, the intention of the parties controls as to the law governing the interpretation of charter parties[99] The rights of the parties to a contract are to be judged by that law by which they intended to bind themselves.[1] Generally, the law of the place where the contract is made is prima facie that which the parties intended, or ought to be presumed to have adopted and which ought to prevail in the absence of circumstances indicating a different intention;[2] hence, in many cases the lex loci contractus has been applied or has been held to prevail,[3] except where the place of performance is in a foreign country.[4] There may, however, be circumstances existing which justify a presumption of an intention that some other law should govern, complying with which presumed intention the law of the flag has been applied in some cases, and in England, in the absence of sufficient circumstances to make out a contrary intention, such law has been held to prevail.[5] It must be determined, having regard to the nature of the contract, and the other circumstances of the case, by what law it will be governed.[6] There is some authority to the effect that charter parties must be considered as governed by the "general maritime law,"[7] and are not to be construed exclusively by the law of the forum,[8] or by the law of the place where the charter was executed.[9]

A federal court of admiralty is not bound to construe and enforce a charter party in the light of the local law prevailing in the state where the agreement is executed, but may consider the contract as governed by the generally prevailing principles of admiralty and maritime law in the absence of a contrary intention of the parties[10] A party who relies on foreign law for the determination of his rights and liabilities under a charter party is bound to bring such law properly before the court and establish it by proof;[11] and it will be considered to be the same as that of the forum, when it does not otherwise appear.[12]

b. General Rules of Construction

The general rules as to the construction of contracts are applicable to the construction of charter parties.

The general rules as to the construction of contracts are applicable to the construction of charter parties.[13] Thus, the intention of the parties[14] at the time of making the contract,[15] as evidenced by the language which they have employed[16] and with respect to the controlling law,[17] is to be ascertained and given effect, if possible. The language of the charter should have a very liberal[18] and reasonable[19] construction in furtherance of the real intention of the parties[20] and usage of the trade,[21] and a practical construction from a commercial standpoint is to be preferred and prevails over possible technical uncertainties in the language used.[22] A construction will not be favored which gives one of the parties an undue advantage over the other.[23]

A term will not be implied which is inconsistent with the express provisions of the charter.[24] Neither party to the charter party can be presumed to have waived his own legal rights, but express words must exist in order to support a construction of the charter party resulting in such a way;[25] and still less can one be presumed, by the charter party, to have waived the rights and interests of others.[26]

Surrounding circumstances. Where the language of the charter is not clear, the meaning of its provisions may be construed in the light of the surrounding circumstances,[27] including, in proper cases, the negotiations between the parties leading up to the charter.[28] Evidence of such circumstances may be employed to aid in construction when it may assist in arriving at the true intent of the parties,[29] or when it may explain the meaning of ambiguous terms found in the written contract,[30] but never to alter or modify the plain words of the agreement.[31]

Customs or usages. Custom or usage may be resorted to in the interpretation of charter parties in the absence of express stipulations, or where the meaning of the parties is uncertain or doubtful on the language used, or where the usage may afford explanation or supply deficiencies in the instrument;[32] for a custom may, in a proper case, be one of the circumstances with respect to which the parties have contracted and which they must be presumed to have incorporated in their agreement.[33] In order to entitle such custom to be read into the charter, however, there must be no room to doubt its existence,[34] and it must be reasonable,[35] certain,[36] consistent with the contract,[37] uniformly acquiesced in,[38] and not contrary to law.[39] It must be so general and long established that the parties are conclusively presumed to have been acquainted with it and contracted with respect to it;[40] any usage of such doubtful authority as to be known only to a few has not this operation.[41]

In order to permit of its use as an aid to construction, a custom or usage must be notorious,[42] uniform,[43] and well defined.[44] Custom is not admissible to vary the terms of an unambiguous charter party,[45] or to alter the rights and obligations of the parties from those expressed in such an agreement;[46] and it is not permissible to incorporate a custom into an express charter in writing the terms of which are neither technical nor ambiguous.[47] An asserted change in the customary meaning of terms employed in charter parties must be made out clearly by one asserting it in order to prevent the application of the old and firmly settled custom,[48] and this requirement is even stronger in the case of such an instrument as a charter party where the clauses used are in the old forms, and where the meaning to be given particular clauses ought to continue the same, than in the case of contracts generally.[49] If otherwise sufficiently established, however, it need not affirmatively appear that the custom or usage was actually known by both of the parties to the charter party.[50]

Construction favoring operative effect. A construction is to be favored which will sustain the charter party rather than one which destroys its existence or operation;[51] and the same is true as regards a construction which will give effect to a part of a charter party as contrasted with one which will nullify it.[52] If possible, every word intentionally inserted in a charter must be given its full significance,[53] and every part of the charter accorded its due effect;[54] but in construing charter parties, made, as they almost always are, on prepared and printed forms, and into which terms and conditions are introduced to cover every case which might arise, it is impossible to give force and effect to every term so used in every case and still give the instrument a reasonable construction conformable to the intention of the parties;[55] and, where that is true, the latter consideration prevails.[56] If the parties employ ambiguous language, it is the duty of the court to give, if possible, such effect to it as will not destroy the effect of other clauses clearly phrased and free from any doubt as to their meaning.[57]

Construction of charter as whole. In determining the intention of the parties, the contract must be construed as a whole and all of the provisions of the charter taken into consideration,[58] and particular words are to be construed with respect to the connection in which they are used.[59] Where the provisions of the charter are inharmonious, the general intent, as evidenced by its written portions and its evident leading purpose, should control the minor provisions.[60] A broad general provision is not to be limited by an express stipulation where it appears from the circumstances that the latter was inserted for a special purpose and was not intended to import any limitation of the former.[61] The agreement must also be looked at in its entirety for the respective rights and duties of the parties.[62]

Written or typewritten and printed provisions. A written provision in a charter party is, it has been held, ordinarily controlling, as against an inconsistent printed provision thereof;[63] but it is an equally well settled rule applicable to such contracts, that, if possible, the written and printed provisions should be construed together and as far as possible harmonized.[64] Similar rules prevail as to typewritten provisions occurring in the same instrument with printed provisions.[65] In determining the intention of the parties, matter expunged from a printed form used in drawing up a charter party may be considered.[66] Moreover, an expression appearing in writing in the charter party may require that the charter be construed and applied in the light of such provision, even though the same provision, if it appeared in a printed form, might properly be disregarded as tautological.[67]

Construction of instruments together. If the rights and obligations of the parties to the charter are expressed in two instruments together constituting their contract, such instruments are to be construed together.[68]

Popular or technical meaning of words In the absence of qualifying language, or of other circumstances indicating a contrary intention, the parties to a charter party will be taken to have used words in their ordinary and popular sense,[69] or in their ordinary maritime sense, if they have one,[70] but if, by other expressions in the charter, they indicate an intention to use them in a different sense,[71] or if a consideration of the surrounding circumstances indicates such an intention,[72] the purpose of the parties to give to their words a different meaning will be respected. The actual understanding, being what a reasonable man in like circumstances could have understood a proposal to be, is the meaning which the law will impute to a proposition to which assent is given.[73] When words possessing a technical meaning are incorporated in a charter, the charter must be construed so as to give them the effect proper to this peculiar meaning,[74] and, for this purpose, extrinsic evidence as to the meaning of such expressions may be admitted.[75] If the parties employ an expression having a known legal meaning, it has been held that parol evidence that the parties intended to use it in some different or popular sense is to be rejected, unless the expression, if interpreted according to its legal acceptation, is wholly insensible with respect either to the context of the charter party or the extrinsic facts.[76]

Construction against party choosing terms. Where a charter is ambiguous, it is to be construed most strongly against the party preparing it or employing the words concerning which doubt arises.[77] Thus, where the charter party is on a form prepared by the charterers, its construction will be taken most strictly against them,[78] and particularly as to clauses inserted for their own benefit.[79] Similarly, exceptions in a charter party, inserted by the shipowner for his own benefit, are to be construed most strongly against him,[80] and exceptions put in by brokers for the benefit of the vessel are to be construed strictly against the vessel.[81] This rule of construction has been said, however, to be the last rule of interpretation to be resorted to when all others fail.[82]

Construction by subsequent conduct of parties. Where the parties to a charter party have given it a practical construction by their conduct, such conduct may be used to assist in the determination of the meaning of the provisions of the charter party.[83]

Construction as time charter. The mere fact that a charter calls itself a time charter and specifies that it is not to be construed as a demise of the vessel does not conclusively determine its character.[84]

Particular terms construed. In the footnote following are cited cases in which many words and phrases as employed in charter parties have been judicially construed.[85]

c. Dependent or Independent Covenants

Whether covenants in a charter are dependent, so that one covenant or its performance is a condition precedent to liability on another, or whether they are independent covenants giving rise to independent cross actions only, is a question of construction.

Whether covenants in a charter are dependent, so that one covenant or its performance is a condition precedent to liability on another, or whether they are independent covenants giving rise to independent cross actions only, is a question of construction,[86] to be determined in the light of the expressed intention of the parties.[87] Where one precedes the other in time of performance, or is concurrent therewith, and is necessary or proper to enable the other to perform, or relates to such performance, it has been held that it or its performance is a condition precedent.[88] When mutual covenants go to the whole consideration on both sides, they are mutual conditions, the one precedent to the other,[89] but all technical forms of expression must give way to the intention of the parties in determining whether covenants are dependent or independent.[90]

d. Condition or Warranty or Description

Whether a descriptive statement contained in a charter party is a mere representation, or whether it is a substantive part of the charter, is a question of construction.

Whether a descriptive statement contained in a charter party is a mere representation, or whether it is a substantive part of the charter, is a question of construction,[91] in determining which not only the language of the instrument but also the circumstances under which,[92] and the purposes for which,[93] the charter party was entered into may be considered. If a statement as to capacity, speed, or other qualities is such as to constitute a substantive part of the charter, it ought to be held a warranty or condition rather than a mere representation,[94] notwithstanding the failure to use the word "warranty."[95] Where, in the charter party, time is of the essence of the agreement, statements bearing on the matter of time are conditions precedent and not mere stipulations or representations.[96] Conditions precedent must be definite[97] and they are usually express.[98] Statements have been held to constitute mere representations, where the circumstances were insufficient to cause them to amount to warranties, although made with respect to the speed or capacity of the vessel,[99] its register measurements,[1] or location.[2] Representations as to measurement, capacity, or tonnage are taken as merely descriptive, when the contract taken as a whole shows that the real consideration was the actual carrying capacity of the vessel.[3]

In the absence of bad faith or grossly misleading statements, if the identification is fair, a wide margin may be allowed in description.[4] If, however, there is an actual warranty of the capacity, speed, or other qualities of the vessel, the owner is liable for any deficiency in this respect.[5] In the absence of a provision in the charter party that the vessel shall commence or complete loading by a certain time or that the cargo shall be shipped by a certain day, the owner has a reasonable time within which, by rearrangement of stowage and ballast, to enable the vessel to take the amount of cargo which

Insulation and refrigeration

Where libelants were operating respondent's vessel under a time charter which contemplated a number of voyages and vessel was engaged for transportation of bananas, a highly perishable freight, parties intended that vessel would carry only a cargo of fresh green bananas and such was implied condition under which performance of respondent's warranty as to insulation and refrigeration of vessel was to be tested, therefore, breach of warranty which would justify rescission could not be determined solely on temperature records in absence of an affirmative showing that cargo for voyage was one fit for shipment and of kind that was intended, and inquiry was whether, when laden as intended, vessel was capable of maintaining hold temperature warranted.—Lucayan Transports v. it is agreed that it shall carry.[6] The operative words in a charter party will prevail over the descriptive recitals.[7]

e. Exceptions Clauses

It is a question of construction whether exceptions in a charter party are for the benefit of one party only or of both parties.

It is a question of construction whether exceptions in a charter party are for the benefit of one party only or of both parties.[8] There is authority declaring that such exceptions are intended to protect both owners and charterers, unless the context clearly shows an intention to protect the one or the other only,[9] whether or not the word "mutually" is inserted.[10] Assistance in determining the effect of exceptions may be had by reference to the position of the general exception in the document[11]

f. Effect of Written Charter Party on Oral Representations and Agreements

Representations prior to a charter, which are not embodied in the charter, are superseded by that instrument, in the absence of fraud or mutual mistake.

Representations prior to a charter, which are not embodied in the charter, are superseded by that instrument, in the absence of fraud or mutual mistake;[12] and, in the absence of fraud or misrepresentation in the inception of a charter party, the owner and charterers must be governed by its express terms.[13] The charter party determines and controls the rights and obligations of the parties.[14] However, oral agreements are not superseded by subsequently executed written charters, where the written charters are not a substitute for the oral agreements.[15] Where an oral charter party has been completely executed, a subsequent written charter party between the same parties and dealing with the same subject matter does not necessarily incorporate all of the terms of the contract available to the parties so as to render the terms of the oral agreement inoperative[16] In like manner, there may be a subsequent oral charter party as to the same vessel and between the same parties as are bound by a previous written charter party, and the oral charter party, when it is of that character, is valid and enforceable.[17]

g. Effect and Construction in Connection with Bill of Lading

As between the charterer and the owner, the charter party, and not the bill of lading, is the controlling document. As between the owner and third persons the language of bills of lading may prevail over that of the charter party.

As between the charterer and the owner, the charter party, and not the bill of lading, is the controlling document,[18] and this is true, although the charter party is not expressed in writing but was made in parol.[19] Bills of ladings which do not refer to the charter party do not, as between the shipowner and the charterer, operate as new contracts, and their stipulations do not supersede the provisions of the charter party on the same subject.[20] Where terms of the charter party are specifically incorporated by reference in the bill of

Option granted by oral agreement
Where owner orally agreed to charter vessels for period of two to about five months, and when written charters were presented for execution owner insisted on limiting use of each vessel to one round voyage, and charterer signed the charters under protest and reservation of rights, execution of the charters did not signify an abandonment by charterer of option for two voyages granted by oral agreements, or effect more than an agreement to accept a charter for a single voyage and a promise to pay hire pro tanto for what was the minimum requirement of the earlier agreements —U S. lading, the charter party terms alone are to be looked to for the contract of the parties.[21] A bill of lading referring to a charter party is never to be construed as intending to express the whole intent,[22] or to control the charter party in consequence of mere inharmonious provisions.[23] Where the intent of the charter is clear, a bill of lading given under it, and referring to it as between the ship and the charterer, does not supersede the express provisions of the charter party that are clearly intended to apply to the situation,[24] however inartificially the bill of lading may be framed.[25]

Unless there is sufficient evidence of a waiver of the provisions of the charter, or of some new contract, mere loose and inharmonious expressions in the bill of lading which refer to the charter will not supersede the latter, as respects matters which the charter was clearly designed to cover.[26] The bill of lading will never operate thus to annul or supersede the charter party, unless intended by the parties to have that effect.[27] Where, however, the bill of lading is intended as a modification of the charter party in certain particulars, effect is to be given to that intention even as between the owner and the charterer[28] In some cases it has been held that the bill of lading operated as a mere memorandum or receipt of shipments made in pursuance of the charter,[29] where the bill of lading specifically referred to the charter party,[30] or where it did not,[31] and that its provisions could not affect or modify the liability of the ship[32] The bill of lading may operate, however, in the event of ambiguity in the charter party, to assist in the construction of the latter by resolving doubts with reference thereto.[33] A provision in a charter party that bills of lading are to be binding on the master and the owner as proof of the quantity delivered to the ship makes the bill conclusive evidence on that point,[34] and such a provision is binding in any dispute between the charterer and the owner, arising under the charter party.[35]

As between the owner and third persons, the language of the bills of lading has been held to prevail over that of the charter party, where the two were inconsistent, in cases where third persons without notice whose rights were involved occupied the position of shippers under bills of lading issued by the master, at the instance of the charterer, when the owner retained control and possession of the vessel,[36] or of bona fide indorsees of the bills of lading[37]

It has been said that according to the weight of authority, the bills of lading govern whether or not notice of the charter party existed;[38] and there is authority to the effect that the shipowner cannot, as against strangers to the charter party, who have shipped goods,[39] or consignees[40] or indorsees of the bills of lading for value,[41] claim to set up rights, and that their duties and obligations are not to be measured, under the charter party, which rights or duties are inconsistent with the terms of those bills of lading, although notice of the existence of a charter party be given, even where it is given by the bills of lading themselves.[42] It has been held, however, that strangers to a charter party, who had notice of the existence of the charter party, cannot assert, against the owner's charter contract, their rights under bills of lading issued by the master without authority.[43]

Authority exists recognizing the controlling character of the bill of lading in determining the rights of the parties, despite specific reference to the existence of the charter party in the bill of lading,[44] and even, in proper cases, despite a bill of lading provision incorporating certain of the charter terms in the bill of lading.[45] Where the party whose rights are involved is one occupying such a position toward the owner that notice of the charter party is ineffective to render the charter party controlling, as to him, as against inconsistent terms in the bill of lading, a clause of reference in the bill of lading incorporating therein certain of the charter provisions affects his rights only to the extent to which the language of the charter party has adopted the charter provisions,[46] and the terms of the charter party, which, on a proper construction of the language of the bill of lading, are not specifically included in the latter instrument, do not measure or determine his rights.[47]

A bill of lading containing the words "freights and all other conditions as per charter party" brings into the contract not only all conditions of the charter party which relate to the payment of freight, but all that are referable to the subject matter of the receipt, the carriage, and the discharge of the cargo;[48] but, where an intention appears that the term "exceptions" employed in a bill of lading should include the deviation clause of a charter party, the latter is incorporated and regulates the rights of the parties.[49] However, as to a charter party provision which is sufficiently incorporated in a bill of lading, the rights of the parties, although the parties are strangers to the charter party, are governed and controlled by the charter provision.[50]

It has been held that shippers having notice or knowledge of the provisions of the charter party are bound thereby.[51]

Where, the provisions of bill of lading and charter party being inconsistent, the former instrument is held to govern and the owner is held liable to some stranger to the charter party, under the terms of the bill of lading, there is authority permitting recovery over against the charterer for the liability thus incurred by reason of the charterer's conduct in preparing incorrect bills of lading and securing their signature by the master, under a clause in the charter requiring the latter to sign bills of lading as presented without prejudice to the charter party.[52]

Requirement of master's signature of bills. Where the charter party requires the master to sign shippers' bills of lading as presented, without prejudice to the charter party, he is bound to sign any usual bill presented, describing goods actually delivered to the vessel,[53] and a refusal to do so is a breach of the charter party, which entitles the shipper to such damages as may be shown.[54] The master is not, however, required to sign erroneous bills;[55] and thus he cannot be required to sign the bills unless the goods have been delivered,[56] and he cannot be required to sign them in any form the charterers may choose.[57] He is required to sign only bills of lading lawfully and rightly presented under the charter provisions.[58] The charterer, under a charter party containing such a clause, is under a duty to present for signature only proper bills of lading.[59] Provision in the charter party for signature

§ 33. Operation of Arbitration Clauses

In the absence of statute, a clause in a charter that any dispute is to be submitted to arbitration is unenforceable, but, where appropriate statutory provisions exist, they operate to render arbitration agreements enforceable to the extent and under the circumstances contemplated and provided by statute.

In the absence of a statute binding the court wherein suit is brought, it has been held that a clause in a charter that any dispute is to be submitted to arbitration, the intended effect being to prevent proceedings in any court and substitute the decision of arbitrators, is unenforceable.[62] A breach of the agreement, while it is totally executory, gives rise to nominal damages only,[63] exceptions will be sustained to a libel claiming damages for breach of agreement to arbitrate and the libel will be dismissed.[64] The legal effect of an arbitration clause in a charter party is governed by the law of the place where the charter party was executed.[65]

Under statutes validating arbitration agreements, such agreements are binding and enforceable to the extent and under the circumstances contemplated and provided by statute,[66] but arbitration agreements which are not within the purview of the statutes are not enforceable.[67] A clause in the charter party, providing that it shall be construed according to the law of a jurisdiction wherein ar-

Purpose of statutes

(1) United States Arbitration Act was intended to validate arbitration agreements as affirmative defenses in admiralty as well as in other courts.—In re Utility Oil Corporation, C.C.A.N.Y., 69 F.2d 524, certiorari denied Petroleum Nav. Co. v. Utility Oil Corporation, 54 S.Ct. 866, 292 U.S. 655, 78 L.Ed. 1504.

(2) The Arbitration Act was passed to provide for maintaining jurisdiction of court while at same time recognizing arbitration agreements as affirmative defenses and providing a forum for their specific enforcement.—American Sugar Refining Co. v. The Anaconda, C.C.A.Fla., 138 F.2d 765, affirmed 64 S.Ct. 863, 322 U.S. 42, 88 L.Ed. 1117.

(3) The purpose of the section of the Arbitration Act relative to a party's beginning an action in admiralty by proceeding by libel and seizure of property of other party is to give an aggrieved party in a maritime controversy the benefit of jurisdiction in rem or by foreign attachment and at same time to save his right to arbitration provided for in contract between the parties.—The Belize, D.C.N.Y., 25 F.Supp. 663, appeal dismissed, C.C.A., 101 F.2d 1005—The Sydfold, D.C.N.Y., 25 F.Supp. 662.

(4) The purpose of Arbitration Act § 8 is to make certain that rights conferred by § 4, which requires specific performance of an arbitration agreement, would be available as well in admiralty suits where property was seized as in those where it was not.—American Sugar Refining Co. v. The Anaconda, C.C.A.Fla., 138 F.2d 765, affirmed 64 S.Ct. 863, 322 U.S. 42, 88 L.Ed. 1117.

Arbitration in foreign state

Provision for arbitration outside the United States, embodied in charter agreement between international refugee organization and steamship company, was valid.—International Refugee Organization v. Republic S.S. Corp., D.C.Md., 93 F.Supp. 798, appeal dismissed and mandamus granted, C.A., 189 F.2d 858.

Maritime transaction or foreign commerce

(1) Under statute providing for enforcement of written arbitration clause "in any maritime transaction or a contract evidencing a transaction involving commerce," the word "or" denotes an alternative and court has jurisdiction to compel arbitration if either maritime transaction or foreign commerce is involved.—The Aakre, D.C.N.Y., 21 F.Supp. 540.

(2) A provision in charter party for trip of Norwegian ship from Canadian to South American ports, that disputes thereunder should be arbitrated in New York, involved a "maritime transaction."—The Aakre, supra.

(3) Disputes involving right of charterer to recover for loss attributable to bad fuel oil furnished by owner to charterer under collateral agreement, including loss of hire and additional expenses due to shipment of intended cargo by rail and right to obtain restitution of amount paid for substitution of vessel chartered for vessel originally chartered on representation that vessel chartered would be available at earlier date, were subject to arbitration as arising out of a "maritime transaction" within statute.—In re Canadian Gulf Line, C.C.A.N.Y., 98 F.2d 711.

bitration agreements are by statute enforceable, does not bind the courts of another jurisdiction to recognize the enforceability of such agreements;[68] and, regardless of such a provision, it has been held that an arbitration agreement will not be enforced unless it is one enforceable by the law of the forum.[69] Likewise, where an arbitration clause appears in the charter party, providing for arbitration outside the jurisdiction, resort to arbitration is not a condition precedent to the existence of jurisdiction in a court wherein suit on the charter party is brought,[70] even though there are controlling statutes rendering arbitration clauses of the description therein set out enforceable;[71] even under such circumstances, a charter agreement for arbitration elsewhere does not oust the court of its jurisdiction,[72] but, at the most, provides grounds for a stay pending the perfection of what cannot be accomplished within the jurisdiction of the court.[73]

In construing the arbitration clause the whole clause should be considered.[74] The terms of the statutes and of the charter agreements as construed by the courts govern questions as to the right to compel arbitration in particular cases,[75] the jurisdiction and powers of the court,[76] the issues triable,[77] and matters of procedure generally,[78] the

Total nonperformance of charter agreement

In controversy between steamship company and charterer of vessel, fact that vessel never actually went into operation under charter due to refusal of steamship company to deliver vessel to charterer, although amounting to total nonperformance, would not nullify requirement for arbitration under terms of charter agreement—International Refugee Organization v. Republic S S Corp, D.C Md, 93 F.Supp 798, appeal dismissed and mandamus granted, C.A., 189 F. 2d 858.

Libel in tort or contract

Whether libel for loss of cargo sounded in tort or in contract was immaterial, as respected right to arbitration.—The Gerald A. Fagan, C. C A.N Y., 49 F.2d 215, affirmed 52 S Ct. 166, 284 U.S 263, 76 L Ed 282

Fraud

Where cause of action asserted by plaintiff in attachment suit in admiralty arose out of alleged fraud, which if established rendered charter party void, and cause of action did not arise under charter party, provision in charter party for arbitration did not preclude trial court from granting relief to plaintiff on ground of alleged fraud—International Refugee Organization v. Republic S. S Corp, C.A.4, 189 F.2d 858.

Right to preserve status quo

Where charter party agreement expressly provided that owner of vessel retained no control, possession, or command whatsoever of vessel during period of charter, proposed act of seizure by owner would deprive charterer of its right to possession pending arbitration, and would substantially change the status quo, and, therefore, in exercise of its equity power, court had the right to preserve the status quo, pending enforcement of arbitration provisions of charter agreement—Albatross S. S Co. v Manning Bros, D C N Y, 95 F.Supp 459

Provision to oust jurisdiction of court

(1) A libel setting out a cause of action within admiralty jurisdiction based on seizure of libeled vessel was not dismissible on ground that charter party containing a provision for arbitration, by providing that Arbitration Act § 8 should not apply to any arbitration thereunder, waived the right to invoke the in rem jurisdiction of admiralty, since a party cannot stipulate away such a jurisdiction which the act declares open as heretofore—The Anaconda v American Sugar Refining Co., Fla, 64 S.Ct. 863, 322 U.S. 42, 88 L.Ed 1117.

(2) Such provision was void to extent that it attempted to oust jurisdiction of admiralty court and nullify provisions of the act—American Sugar Refining Co v The Anaconda, C C A Fla., 138 F.2d 765, affirmed 64 S Ct. 863, 322 U.S. 42, 88 L Ed. 1117.

Provision as to residence of arbitrators

District court had jurisdiction to entertain demand for arbitration by plaintiff suing for breach of charter party contract containing arbitration clause, notwithstanding provision of contract that arbitrators should be selected from persons who did not live within territorial jurisdiction of such district court.—La Nacional Platanera, S. C. L v North American Fruit & Steamship Corp., C.C.A. Ala., 84 F.2d 881.

Existence of agreement

In libel for breach of charter party allegedly containing an arbitration clause, federal district court had jurisdiction, before sending issues to arbitrators, to determine whether the parties had made an agreement to arbitrate, and it would be improper to submit to arbitrators the issue of making the charter party.—Kulukundis Shipping Co, S/A, v. Amtorg Trading Corp, supra.

Validity of contract

In determining whether to compel arbitration of controversy in accordance with arbitration clause of charter party agreement, court was required to determine whether contract containing arbitration clause was valid.—Goldhill Trading & Shipping Co, S A. Panama, v. Caribbean Shipping Co, D C.N.Y., 56 F.Supp. 31.

78. Pleading

(1) Under the Arbitration Act an executory arbitration agreement is not basis for a plea in bar, but may right to a stay of proceedings pending arbitration,[79] the designation of an arbitrator or umpire,[80] the proceedings by, and powers of, the arbitrators,[81] and their judgment and award.[82] Any award by arbitrators is inoperative as against a party to a charter who has refused to take any action at all under an arbitration clause therein and who has in no way brought about, participated in, or consented to any reference to arbitration.[83] In determining the amount of compensation to be allowed to the arbitrators, their earning capacity and expert knowledge of technical problems involved may be considered.[84]

Matters subject to arbitration. In proceedings to enforce an agreement for arbitration, the matters referred to arbitration, and determined by the arbitrators, must be within the terms of the arbitration agreement.[85] Repudiation of a charter party be made the basis of a stay order—Kulukundis Shipping Co, S/A, v Amtorg Trading Corp, C C A N Y, 126 F 2d 978.

(2) In libel for breach of charter party, libelee was not precluded from pleading in alternative first denying existence of charter party and then alleging that, if it existed, there should be a stay pending arbitration of appropriate issues—Kulukundis Shipping Co, S/A, v. Amtorg Trading Corp, supra.

Taxation of costs

An order directing arbitration in accordance with an agreement is a "final order" so as to justify the taxation of costs, since a proceeding to compel arbitration is an independent proceeding resulting in an order which in substance is a decree for specific performance of the agreement to arbitrate—The Sydfold, D C.N.Y., 25 F Supp. 662.

79. Effect of denial

An order denying motion for stay of proceeding, under arbitration act, pending arbitration of dispute between owners and charterer was not "res judicata" of right to compel arbitration, or a bar to a motion to compel arbitration, under terms of the charter party.—In re Pahlberg Petition, C C.A.N Y., 131 F.2d 968—Richard Nathan Corp. v Diacon-Zadeh, D.C.N Y, 101 F Supp. 428.

80. Lapse in naming arbitrator

Where owner refused to appoint arbitrator under charter party providing that on such refusal charterer's arbitrator could decide alone, and owner, after unsuccessfully litigating question whether arbitration clause governed controversy involved, promptly appointed its arbitrator after question was finally decided, statute authorizing court to appoint arbitrators where there has been lapse in naming them was inapplicable.—In re Utility Oil Corporation, D. 81. Board of arbitrators

(1) Arbitration clause of charter party providing for submission of disputes to board of three arbitrators warranted inference that such arbitrators were intended to act as a board—Petrol Corp v. Groupement D'Achat Des Carburants, D C N Y, 84 F Supp 446

(2) Although charter party provided for a three-man board of arbitration, parties could mutually agree to let one arbitrator decide the issues, treating his as an umpire and the other arbitrators as advocates and agents of the parties designating them—Petrol Corp v. Groupement D'Achat Des Carburants, supra.

Delay in naming arbitrator

(1) Charter party authorizing arbitrator appointed by either party to decide alone if other party neglected or refused to appoint its arbitrator within a specified period of time after request was valid and was intended, under fair and equitable interpretation, to operate only where party unreasonably neglected or refused to appoint arbitrator within time limited—In re Utility Oil Corporation, D C N Y., 10 F.Supp. 678

(2) Fact that owner refused to appoint arbitrator within time limited in charter party did not entitle the charterer's arbitrator to proceed, where owner bona fide litigated question whether arbitration clause applied to controversy involved, and promptly appointed arbitrator when such question was finally decided adversely to owner's contention.—In re Utility Oil Corporation, supra

(4) Disputes as to warranty respecting vessel's speed and passenger capacity and fuel oil consumption, as to whether charterer had performed its obligation under charter and had right to cancel charter, and as to what extent, if any, either party was indebted to other.—Interna-

by the owner of the vessel by failure to deliver the vessel to the charterer,[86] or the issue of damages for breach of the charter party where one of the alleged parties to the contract denies its existence,[87] has been held to be a matter subject to arbitration under the arbitration clause of the contract, but under a particular agreement which was construed to contemplate arbitration of disputes arising after commencement of the voyage it was held that refusal of the owner of the vessel to proceed with the voyage before its commencement was not subject to arbitration.[88] A clause for arbitration of disputes "arising during performance" of the charter applies to any disputes arising after performance has begun,[89] even though performance on both sides has terminated.[90]

The arbitration clause of a charter party does not govern shipment, carriage, delivery, or the terms on which delivery is to be made or taken; it only governs the way of settling disputes arising out of conditions of the charter party, not disputes arising out of the bill of lading.[91] Where the arbitration clause in a charter party is not specifically mentioned in the bill of lading, it is not incorporated in, or made a part of, the terms and conditions of the bill of lading,[92] and, accordingly, disputes arising out of the bill of lading are not subject to arbitration under that clause.[93] A general statement of incorporation of the terms of the charter party in the bill of lading is insufficient to incorporate an arbitration clause of the charter party in the bill of lading.[94]

Waiver, abandonment, or rescission. Arbitration may be waived, abandoned, or rescinded by agreement or action of the parties.[95] The filing of a petition for exoneration from, or limitation of, liability does not waive the arbitration provision of the charter,[96] and a person who commences a suit in admiralty by libel and seizure of the vessel or other property of the other party according to the usual course of admiralty proceedings does not repudiate an arbitration clause,[97] and is not foreclosed from later demanding an arbitration.[98] There is no waiver or abandonment where the party consistently insists on arbitration and properly brings the controverted point before the court.[99] Under the particular facts, a party has been held not precluded from compelling arbitration by laches,[1] or by a failure to file a motion to compel arbitration until after the other party had commenced a suit to recover damages for nondelivery.[2] Arbitration cannot be avoided where the agreement is not so indefinite or uncertain as to be unenforceable.[3] The participation by petitioner in an action between respondent and another has been held not an intentional relinquishment of petitioner's right to compel arbitration of disputes between it and respondent.[4]

A party may waive his right to object or be estopped from asserting that libelant was not entitled to invoke the arbitration clause.[5] The failure of a party to object to an arbitrator because of interest or bias at any time before the award may constitute a waiver of any objection to his participation,[6] and he may acquiesce in the submission of issues to an umpire through arbitrators nominated by the parties.[7]

§ 34. Charterer as Owner Pro Hac Vice

a. Existence of relation
b. Effect of charter's character on liability of owner and charterer

a. Existence of Relation

(1) In general
(2) Interpretation of charter provisions

(1) In General

If by the terms of a charter, or necessary intendment of the parties, the entire vessel is let to the charterer, with a transfer to him of its command and possession, and consequently of control over its navigation, he will generally be considered as owner pro hac vice, that is, as owner for the voyage or service stipulated.

Under some forms of a charter party the charterer becomes the owner of the vessel chartered for the voyage or service stipulated, and consequently becomes subject to the duties and responsibilities of ownership.[8] Whether in any particular case such result follows must depend on the terms of the charter party[9] and the nature of the service rendered;[10] the question as to the character in which the charterer is to be treated is, in all cases, one of construction.[11] There is no difference of opinion in the cases as to the rule of law applicable when the construction of the particular charter party is settled,[12] all the cases agreeing that entire command and possession of the vessel, and consequent control over its navigation, must be surrendered to the charterer before he can be held as special owner for the voyage or other service mentioned,[13] and that the retention by the general owner of such command, possession, and control is incompatible with the existence at the same time of such special ownership in the charterer.[14] There are, however, some differences of opinion as to the effect to be given certain technical terms used in the charter party in determining whether the instrument parts with the entire possession and control of the vessel.[15]

If by the terms of a charter, or necessary intendment of the parties, the entire vessel is left to the Change of relations between owner and charterer

(1) Where a charter party is a private contract and not a contract of common carriage, the relations between the owner and the charterer are not altered if the charterer chooses to put the ship on the berth and offer her to shippers as a common carrier, and the liability of the owner is not affected by notice that the charterer might put the vessel on berth as a general ship.—The Toledo, D.C.N.Y., 30 F.Supp. 93, affirmed, C.C.A., 122 F.2d 255, certiorari denied Isbrandtsen-Moller Co. v. (2) Where city chartered a scow as a floating platform on which to conduct fireworks display, the city assumed the ordinary duties of a bailee in connection with that undertaking, since the vessel did not cease to be such because of the nonmaritime use to which she was put, and the nature of the relation was not changed by referring to the scow as a floating platform.—Kenny v. charterer, with a transfer to him of its command and possession, and consequently of control over its navigation, he will generally be considered as owner pro hac vice, that is, as owner for the voyage or service stipulated,[16] whether the letting is in writing or by parol;[17] and there are statutes in some jurisdictions in substance providing thus.[18] If the charter party lets only the use of the vessel, the owner at the time retaining the command and possession and control over its navigation, the charterer is regarded as a contractor for a designated service,[19] the duties and responsibilities of the owner are not changed,[20] and the charterer is not clothed with the character or responsibility of ownership.[21] In the former case, the general owner is not a common carrier, but a bailee to transport for hire,[22] and the charter is a contract for the lease[23] or demise[24] of the vessel, whereby the lessee assumes the duties and liabilities in a large measure, at least, of the owner;[25] in the latter it is a contract for a special service to be rendered by the owner of the vessel,[26] more specifically, a contract for affreightment,[27] or for the transportation of passengers.[28] In accordance with this distinction, a demise charter is often called a "bare boat charter."[29] Numerous clauses have been considered and referred to in this connection,[30] and, in the light of the principles announced, the provisions of various charter parties have been construed, and have been considered under the rules as constituting[31] or not

Title

A "demise charter" is only a hiring of the vessel, under which no title passes to the charterer but merely the right to possess and control it for a limited period, and such right to possession is not the equivalent of "title" and does not subject the vessel to the general debts of the charterer—McGahern v. constituting[32] the charterer the owner pro hac vice.

Presumption against ownership pro hac vice. The inclination of courts is to construe a charter party as a contract of affreightment, charging the shipowners as carriers, and not as a demise of the vessel, unless its tenor clearly calls for the latter construction,[33] and the presumption to that effect is said to be so strong that if the end sought to be effected by the charter party can conveniently be accomplished without the transfer of the vessel to the charterers, courts are not inclined to regard the contract as a demise of the ship, although there may be express words of grant in the formal parts of the instrument.[34] However, if the nature of the service and the due attainment of the object sought to be accomplished by the charter party requires the vessel to be absolutely under the control, and subject to the orders and directions, of the charterer, courts of justice will, as a general rule, give effect to the contract as a demise of the ship[35] One claiming that the charterer has been constituted owner pro hac vice cannot prevail on any loose or vague provisions in the charter party,[36] and the general owner of a ship will be deemed owner for the voyage where the intention of the parties in that respect is indefinite on the face of the charter party.[37]

Subsequent conduct of parties as aid to determination. The conduct of the parties under the charter may be useful to aid in the construction of a charter party where it is uncertain from the terms employed whether it was intended as a demise or as a mere contract for affreightment.[38]

(a) In General

The presence of express words of letting or demise indicates that the charterer is, by the charter party, the owner pro hac vice.

The presence of express words of letting or demise indicates that the charterer is, by the charter party, the owner pro hac vice.[39] Language appropriate to the demise of the vessel is not conclusive,[40] but has considerable weight;[41] the effect to be given to such a provision essentially depends on all the terms of the instrument taken together.[42] Thus, a special ownership does not necessarily pass, although the terms of the instrument are "let and hired," and the hirer agrees to pay a gross sum.[43] The terms "charter,"[44] "let,"[45] "freighting,"[46]

"rent,"[47] and "hire"[48] have been held not to be words of demise, in this connection.

Stipulations as to "delivery." The charterer's agreement to deliver the vessel up to the owner after the performance of the voyage has been regarded as furnishing evidence of a demise,[49] but the use of such terms as "acceptance,"[50] "employ,"[51] and "delivery,"[52] in the charter party, although indicative of a demise of the vessel, is not absolutely irreconcilable with the contrary result. Such provisions are, for this purpose, to be construed in connection with the rest of the charter terms and given the effect appropriate to such construction.[53] A clause for the payment of freight on the delivery of the cargo has, by analogy of reasoning to the cases with respect to the delivery of the ship, been held to indicate that the charter party was not a demise of the vessel,[54] as have other undertakings and agreements of the owner referring to the delivery of the cargo.[55]

Provisions regarding compensation. Provision for compensation to be based on a fixed sum over and above the expenses of the vessel is not inconsistent with the interpretation of a charter party as being a contract for carriage only,[56] and, indeed, is more in accord with such a view than with a construction of the charter party as a demise;[57] and, likewise, a provision for compensation based on a proportionate share of the net earnings is consistent with a contract of affreightment merely.[58] On the other hand, the charter party has been construed as a demise of the vessel, although it was provided that the compensation of the owner should consist of a certain proportion of the net proceeds of the adventure.[59] It is insufficient to show an intention that the charter shall operate as a lease of the vessel, that the parties stipulate for compensation on a per diem basis,[60] although the renting of a vessel at a daily rate has been held to constitute a demise.[61] The payment of a gross sum for the hire of the chartered vessel is not inconsistent with retention of possession and control by the general owner.[62]

(b) Language Indicative of, or Consistent with, Retention of Possession

Where the general owners have by the terms of the charter party undertaken duties in respect of the vessel and obligations to the charterer which cannot be performed unless they remain owners of the vessel and have control over it, such terms are indicative of a charter for affreightment only rather than a demise.

It has been recognized as a general proposition that, where the owners have by the terms of the charter party undertaken duties in respect of the vessel and obligations to the charterer which cannot be performed unless they remain as owners of the vessel and have control over it, such clauses are indicative of a charter for affreightment only rather than a demise,[63] thus it has been held that stipulations that the owners shall keep the vessel in good condition during the existence of the charter would be inconsistent with the charter's being such a one as to amount to a demise of the vessel.[64] Stipulations expressly providing for the control of navigation by the owner,[65] or designating the mas-

Absence of owner's right to control operation

Mere fact that owner of vessel chartered to another was to be compensated by a percentage of the profits, in absence of agreement to be responsible for losses occurring in its operation, did not make owner a co-partner or joint adventurer so as to be liable for lost cargo, and, in absence of showing that owner retained some right to control operation of vessel, such agreement should be held to be a demise—Pan American Airways v. ter and mariners as servants of the owner,[66] are inconsistent with a construction of the charter party as a demise of the vessel; so, also, is an express declaration in the charter that it is not to be construed as a demise of the vessel.[67]

A stipulation that the owners shall receive certain goods on board at the direction of the charterer and refuse to receive other goods without its assent would be out of place, it has been held, in a charter giving entire possession and control to the charterer,[68] as have such stipulations as that the vessel shall be ready for the delivery of the cargo at a named date, which is subsequent to the date when the charter party takes effect,[69] that the cargo shall be received and delivered within reach of the vessel's tackles, at the ports of loading and discharging,[70] that lay days are to commence from the time the captain reports himself ready to receive or discharge cargo,[71] that the vessel shall proceed to certain ports for loading and shall return with all possible dispatch to the designated port of discharge where the master shall make true and faithful delivery of the cargo,[72] that the owners undertake that the captain shall prosecute voyages with dispatch,[73] that the captain or owners shall have an absolute lien on the cargo for sums due,[74] that the vessel shall carry, at certain times, certain cargo for the charterer free of charge,[75] or that the owner shall appoint a captain to command and run the vessel.[76]

Other language has been held indicative of, or consistent with, the retention of possession, such as that the charterer is to pay the expenses, not by himself disbursing the money, but by keeping a sufficient deposit with the clerk for that purpose,[77] that the charterer shall have the liberty of putting a passenger on board in the cabin[78] or shall have the privilege of sending a supercargo on the vessel's voyages,[79] that the owner shall discharge the cargo on the vessel's return to port,[80] that the owner may withdraw the chartered ship and substitute for it another ship of like design, capacity, etc.,[81] that the owner shall have the faculty of withdrawing the ship from the charterer in the event of stipulated defaults of the latter,[82] that the captain shall render all possible assistance with the ship's crew and boats,[83] or that, if the charterers are dissatisfied with the conduct of the officers or men, the owners engage to investigate any complaint, and, if necessary, make a change in the appointments.[84]

In addition, other charter party provisions have been considered and treated as compatible with, or indicative of, retention of control by the owner, as a provision that the whole of the vessel available for carriage shall be at the sole use and disposal of the charterer,[85] that the charterer assume all risk of the cargo,[86] that the charterer shall submit to the captain regarding the stowage and method of loading the cargo,[87] that the vessel is to perform such duties in accordance with the terms of the agreement as may be required of her by the charterers,[88] that there shall be a deduction from the demurrage if the vessel shall be detained by the owner or his agent for supplies or repairs or men,[89] that the charterer may load or discharge from on board such cargo, in the ports or places named in the charter, as by them shall be ordered,[90]

that the vessel shall be employed in a specified manner or for such other service as the charterer might designate,[91] that the charterer shall pay the wages of the crew, or the expenses of the voyage,[92] that the master of a vessel, employed by the owner, shall be under the directions of the charterer, who may direct where cargo shall be taken and discharged,[93] or that the owner shall provide the vessel with the necessary men, supplies, and repairs,[94] or shall defray the expenses of the crew and the vessel[95]

(c) Language Indicative of, or Consistent with, Demise

Charter party provisions that the hirer shall have the same authority as the owner of the vessel as to her management and control, that the captain and officers shall be under the direction of the charterer, that the charterer shall select the officers and crew, that the charterer shall man and equip the vessel at his expense, and other similar provisions have been treated as operative to indicate a letting of the vessel.

Particular charter party provisions which have been treated as operative to indicate a letting of the vessel include a provision that the hirer shall have the same authority as the owner of the vessel as to her management and the control of the officers,[96] that the captain, although appointed by the owners, shall be under the orders and direction of the charterer as regards employment, agency, and other arrangements,[97] that the officers of the vessel, including those to be appointed by the owner, shall be in all respects under the order and direction of the charterer,[98] that the charterer shall select the officers and crew,[99] that the charterer shall man and equip the vessel at his expense[1] or shall pay for provisions, stores, supplies, etc.,[2] or that the charterer shall keep the vessel in repair[3] and dock and paint her at his own expense.[4]

In addition, other provisions of charter parties have been treated as operative to indicate a letting of the vessel, as that the charterer shall have full charge of the vessel,[5] that the charterers agree to indemnify the owners from all consequences arising from the captain's signing or complying with bills of lading,[6] that, in the event of the happening of certain contingencies, the master shall, on receiving notice thereof, take and hold possession of the vessel for and as the representative of the owner,[7] that the charterer shall insure the vessel,[8] that the charterer should have the absolute right of selection of the place for discharge of the cargo, provided the steamer shall lie safely afloat at any tide,[9] that it shall be lawful for the charterers or their agents to load the vessel,[10] that the charterer shall have the right to employ the vessel in any kind of lawful carriage anywhere between fixed limits,[11] that all of the earnings of the vessel during the term, of whatever character, shall belong to the charterer and inure to his sole benefit,[12] or that the charterer shall have a prior option to purchase the vessel at any time during the term of the charter.[13]

A charter party may amount to a demise of the vessel constituting the charterer the owner for the particular purpose or voyage despite the presence in the contract of clauses providing that the owner was to provide an efficient crew[14] and to pay their wages,[15] that the owner should assume responsibil-

(d) Charter of Whole or Part of Vessel

A charter of the whole ship is not conclusive of a demise, but the fact that the charterer does not charter the whole vessel has been treated as a circumstance indicating that the charterer is not to become owner pro hac vice.

A charter of the whole ship,[27] or the mere fact that the charter party contemplates that the charterer is to have the whole and exclusive use of the vessel,[28] is not conclusive of a demise, and a charter party will not be thus construed, unless the possession is transferred to the charterer, even where the whole capacity of the vessel is let.[29] That circumstance, however, coupled with a chartering for a voyage to be made by the charterers, has been treated as indicative of that result,[30] as it is where it is coupled with an agreement of the charterer to pay hire for the use of the vessel.[31] On the other hand, where the charter lets, not the whole vessel, but the whole tonnage to the charterers, that form of expression indicates that the charter is not a demise.[32]

The fact that the charterer does not charter the whole vessel has been treated as a circumstance indicating that the charterer is not to become owner pro hac vice.[33] A clause, reserving and excepting from the whole space of the vessel, granted to the charterer, such space as might be necessary for the officers or the crew, or for the supplies needed for the working of the vessel, has been treated as seemingly designed to exclude any intention of the general owner to give up the control of the vessel,[34] although such a provision has been said by other authority to be unimportant,[35] and charter parties have been construed as demises despite its presence.[36]

Status as private or common carrier. A ship chartered for a special cargo or to a special person is not a common carrier, but merely an ordinary bailee to transport for hire or a private contract carrier,[37] leaving the parties free to contract as they choose,[38] and the agreement they make is not subject to the considerations of public policy which limit the agreement of common carriers;[39] but, if a part of a ship is available to the public, although the other portion is taken up by a cargo shipped under special charter, the owner is still a common carrier.[40]

(e) Omission of Particular Terms and Expressions

It is not indispensable to constitute the charterer the owner for the voyage that express terms of demise and letting should appear on the face of the charter party, but it is sufficient that the language used shows an intent to transfer the possession, command, and control.

The omission of words of grant or demise,[41] or of express declarations imposing duties on the charterer, which are appropriate as incidents to the right of possession or control,[42] has been treated as significant to indicate that he did not become owner pro hac vice. It is not, however, indispensable to constitute the charterer the owner for the voyage that express terms of demise and letting should appear on the face of the charter party,[43] but is sufficient that the language used shows an intent to transfer the possession, command, and control.[44] The fact that the charter party contains no terms or expressions with regard to delivery of the vessel is significant as indicating that the charter is not a demise.[45]

The omission of words appropriate to a contract of affreightment merely, and the presence of terms peculiarly appropriate to a demise, indicate the latter to be the intended effect of a charter party.[46] The omission of any express declaration that it should be the owner's duty to man and equip the vessel has been said in at least one case to have some weight as indicating an intention to vest in the charterer the ownership for the voyage.[47] The fact that there is no provision for the duration or termination of the charter party is not sufficient to prevent a charter from constituting a demise of the vessel.[48] The omission of words expressly declaring the charter not to be a demise is not material in determining its character, where that sufficiently appears from the context of the whole instrument.[49]

(f) Barges and Similar Boats without Motive Power

Generally, charters of barges without motive power accompanied by a bargee paid by the owner are demises,[50] even though the general owner is himself

Oral charters of barges in local harbors constitute demises.—Marstaller v. Albina Dock Co., supra

Failure to collect insurance

The carrying of insurance on lighters by owners of lighters and their failure to collect on insurance because no bargees were aboard at time the bargee;[51] and the same rule applies to all bare boat charters of boats without motive power.[52] Where, however, boats without motive power are chartered in conjunction with one having such power, to be used as a single flotilla, the charter is a mere contract of affreightment as to the whole group if the circumstances are such that it is so as to the vessel possessing motive power under the rules generally applicable;[53] and this is true, although the boats without motive power are first hired,[54] and although there is added to the flotilla a boat without motive power chartered from a third person by the charterer so as to constitute him, as to that boat, owner pro hac vice.[55] A charter of a barge will not amount to a demise where the alleged charterer has no control of it and cannot use it in his business[56]

b. Effect of Charter's Character on Liability of Owner and Charterer

(1) In general
(2) Liability for torts generally
(3) Liability for injury to, or nondelivery of, cargo
(4) Liability for supplies, repairs, and materials

(1) In General

Where a charter party is a mere contract for the service of affreightment, the master is the agent of the owner, but, as a general rule, under a charter amounting to a demise, the officers and crew are the agents of the charterer.

Where a charter party is a mere contract for the service of affreightment, the master is the agent of the owner,[57] and the crew are in the employment of the owner;[58] he is answerable for their conduct[59] and bound by contracts made by them as of accident were not persuasive that owners understood the hire agreement to be a time charter and not the usual oral demise of lighters without motive power.—Banks v. Chas Kurz Co, D C Pa., 69 F Supp 1017.

Bargee or barge captain

(1) The barge captain remains the agent and servant of the owner—Corpus Juris cited in The Martha R Grimes, D C N.Y, 49 F Supp. 591, 594—Harbor Towboat Co v. Lowe, D C. (2) The rule that captain of chartered barge who was hired by owner of barge is employee of owner is controlling on New York Barge Canal as well as in New York Harbor—Harbor Towboat Co. v Lowe, D.C.N. Y, 47 F Supp. 454.

(3) Under the usual harbor charter by which the owner pays the wages of the bargee, the bargee is the agent of the owner with respect to tending lines—The Casleton, D C N.Y, 60 F. 2d 132, affirmed, C C A, 64 F 2d 11.

(4) Where owner's bargee went with the barge and his services were paid for by the owner except as to overtime, such bargee remained agent and representative of owner in so far as care of barge was concerned, notwithstanding bargee was required to report to the charterer where barge was when she was light—The Montezuma III, D.C.N.Y, 66 F.Supp. 562

his agents within the scope of their authority.[60] Likewise, he, and not the charterer, can claim the benefits of any contracts made under such circumstances.[61]

As a general rule, under a charter amounting to a demise, the officers and crew are the agents of the charterer,[62] even though not appointed by him,[63] and not of the general owner,[64] and the latter is not responsible for their acts[65] or contracts,[66] save in the particulars provided for by the charter party,[67] at least where those claiming on the basis of such acts or contracts had notice of the charter party at the time of their execution.[68] The effect of the charterer's status as owner pro hac vice on his rights and obligations and those of the general owner operates from the time when he takes delivery of the vessel under the charter party.[69] Where a charter party, amounting to a letting of the possession of a vessel but terminable at the owner's option is entered into, the charterer is owner pro hac vice as to every voyage undertaken by him before he receives notice from the general owner of an intention to terminate the hiring.[70]

Status and duties as to winchmen. There is authority holding that, where the owner of a chartered ship, undertakes to supply winches and men to work them, and an accident is caused through the winchman's negligence to a stevedore employed by the charterer in loading or unloading cargo, the owner is to be held responsible, even though the charter stipulates that the winches shall be at the charterers' disposal during loading and discharging,[71] and further that the charterer, if held liable for such injuries, can recover over against the owner;[72] but there is other authority to the contrary, holding that such a charter clause, even though the charter is not a demise, makes the charterer liable for such negligence,[73] rather than the owner,[74] the duty of the owner being satisfied if he supplies a competent man to drive the winch.[75] Where there is such a charter, the owner, it has been held, is not liable to the charterer for the cost of a winchman supplied from shore because the ship's man, due to objection by labor unions or for any other reason, is persona non grata to the stevedores or charterers,[76] and the ship fulfills her entire duty in providing sober and competent winchmen from among the crew;[77] but, according to other authority, even under a charter constituting a demise, the owner must supply winchmen with whom the stevedores are willing to work if he has expressly agreed to provide men to work the winches.[78]

Validity and effect of special provisions. Where, under the charter, the officers of the vessel are agents of the owners as to certain matters, and of the charterers as to others, they will be regarded as agents of one party or the other according to the work on which they are engaged.[79] Although the charterer agrees to provide and pay all port charges, it has been held that the owner is liable for delay to the vessel or a fine imposed for failure of the master to secure a bill of health.[80] The mere presence of a stipulation authorizing the charterer to nominate the persons to perform certain special services, who are, however, to be paid and employed by the owner, does not amount to a provision that those special services are to be performed for or by the charterer, or render those appointed for their performance his servants or agents.[81] An owner may rent his vessel to a charter party under a charter containing covenants as to time of departure, managership, and similar provisions, and he may specifically provide that the relationship of employer and employee does not exist without incurring the responsibilities or acquiring the immunities of a master with respect to the person controlled.[82]

Owner's liability for injury to charterer by acts of officers or crew The charterer, when owner pro hac vice, cannot ordinarily charge against the general owner losses occasioned to himself by the torts[83] or crimes[84] of the officers and crew; but, if the charter terms are such as to provide for retention of possession and control by the general owner, he is liable to respond to the charterer for the acts of the master or crew.[85]

Representation of general owner by owner pro hac vice. Where the charterer is owner pro hac vice, he is not the agent of the general owner[86] and the latter is not bound, by virtue of any such relationship, to shippers of bill of lading holders on contracts of carriage made by the charterer;[87] the general owner is not bound on contracts of the charterer for the purchase of goods to make up a cargo,[88] or on contracts for supplies, repairs, and materials,[89] and, furthermore, he is not liable for the negligence of the charterer, acting as master, in the navigation of the vessel.[90]

(2) Liability for Torts Generally

As a general rule, in the absence of a statute otherwise providing, a charterer under a demise charter, and not the actual owner, is liable for negligence in the navigation or running of the vessel. If the contract is one for services or affreightment merely, the owner, and not the charterer, is the one to be charged.

Whether the owner or charterer of a vessel is liable for negligence in the operation of the vessel may be dependent on whether the charter is a demise charter.[91] As a general rule, in the absence of a statute otherwise providing,[92] a charterer, under a demise charter, and not the actual owner, is liable for negligence in the navigation or running of the vessel[93] and also a charterer is liable

(1) Where charter of vessel by owner to another is demise of entire vessel, vesting complete command, possession, and control of vessel in charterer, owner is not liable in personam for torts committed by charterer, even though vessel itself remains liable and subject to action in rem.—Santiago v. U.S., D.C.N.Y., 102 F.Supp. 425.

(2) Under demise charter ship is liable in rem and charterer is liable in personam to third parties injured by negligence of owner pro hac vice, and general or actual owner is not liable in personam to third party injured by negligence of demise charterer, since no relation of master and servant exists.—Vitozi v. Balboa Shipping Co., D.C.Mass., 69 F.Supp. 286, affirmed, C.C.A., 163 F.2d 286.

Vessel of foreign registry

The liability of a charterer of a vessel of foreign registry for injuries to a longshoreman engaged in loading vessel in territorial waters of the United States was governed by American maritime law rather than the law of England.—The Samovar, D.C.Cal., 72 F.Supp. 574.

Joint tort-feasor

Where evidence established that stevedore was negligent in method adopted for loading vessel and that such negligence, together with that of shipbuilder and of bare boat charterer, contributed to the injury of longshoreman employed by stevedore, charterer and builder had a several right to receive contribution for negligence or other misconduct of the crew,[94] and the general owners are not liable for such negligence to the charterer,[95] but in a demise of a barge in which the captain of the barge remains the agent of the owner, the owner may be held liable for injuries resulting from the captain's negligence.[96] There is authority holding that the owner of a vessel who secretly charters her to another, concealing the fact from the officers and hands of the boat, will be liable to third persons for injuries caused by the negligence of the officers and hands in the management of the boat, if a sufficient legal excuse for the secrecy is not given, so as to remove the presumption of fraud, which renders the charter party void as against third persons.[97]

If the contract is one for services or affreightment merely, the owner and not the charterer is the one to be charged,[98] in the absence of some specific stipulation to the contrary in the charter.[99] As in other cases the presumption is against the charterer being owner pro hac vice.[1] Special charter provisions with respect to liability for injury will be enforced as between the parties, according to their terms, regardless of the character of the charter,[2] but the provisions in a charter purporting to limit or apportion liability of either party for tort claims are not effective against an injured third person if the character of the relationship or the laws of the United States impose liability in some other way.[3]

Condition of vessel and appliances. A charterer under a demise charter is under a duty to provide proper gear, equipment, and a safe place to work, including access to it, and he, rather than the actual owner, will be liable for a failure to do so[4] to an independent contractor,[5] or to a stevedore,[6] and under such circumstances the actual owner is not liable.[7] The charter may impose an obligation on the charterer, after the vessel is chartered, to keep from stevedore as a joint tort-feasor to the extent of one half of longshoreman's recovery—The Samovar, supra.

Strict construction

Charter party provisions attempting to excuse a private carrier's negligent breach of its contract, as by a failure to perform its obligation to make vessel seaworthy, must be strictly construed—U S. v Standard Oil Co. of Cal., C C A Cal, 156 F.2d 312.

Errors of navigation

(1) Charter provision relieving tug owner from liability for damage to barges in tow caused by "errors of navigation" used quoted words as meaning negligence or negligent navigation of tug.—The Henry W. Card, D.C N Y., 51 F.Supp. 380, affirmed, C. C A., Davison Chemical Corp. v. The Henry W. Card, 144 F.2d 705.

Doctrine that tugs are common carriers could not be invoked to impose liability on tug's owner for damage to barges in tow resulting from negligent navigation where owner of barges had expressly provided in charter party that errors of navigation were mutually excepted.—The Henry W. Under common-law rules, if applicable to a situation wherein an employee of the charterer of a derrick boat under a demise charter is ina vessel in reasonably safe condition for a third person lawfully thereon.[8] The owners are not liable for negligence with respect to hatches where the vessel was in the hands and under the control of a charterer,[9] unless, by the terms of the charter, the owner undertook the maintenance of the ship;[10] and a bare boat charterer will not be liable for injuries to the employee of an independent contractor because of the condition of the hatches where the independent contractor was warned of the defective condition.[11]

The charterers and others may be liable as joint tortfeasors for injuries to another as the result of the condition of the vessel or appliances.[12] Since the law implies a contract to indemnify one who is legally liable for a loss, where the negligence of the indemnitor gives rise to the liability, the charterer may be indemnified for any loss imposed on it by the negligence of another,[13] notwithstanding its own possible neglect in failing to discover the faulty conditions which allegedly entitled the representative of the injured party to recover,[14] and the charterer may bring in as a party a person who is liable to him.[15] The charterer, although liable as a joint tortfeasor with the owner, may be entitled to contribution.[16] The charterer under a demise charter is under an absolute,[17] nondelegable[18] duty to keep the vessel in a seaworthy condition,[19] and will be liable for its unseaworthiness rather than the actual owner for a failure to do so[20] to a longshoreman[21] or to a ship carpenter.[22] Where, however, after the vessel is chartered, it is still in the control and possession of the owner, the owner will be liable for its unseaworthy condition.[23] Where the shipowner is the party liable, the charterer may recover from the shipowner the full amount of any loss he is jured because of the perilous condition of the boat, owner long out of possession would have no responsibility for the perilous condition.—Muscelli v Frederick Starr Contracting Co, supra.

Nature of proof

Where longshoreman's employer had been engaged to lade ship under bare boat charter to United States and in possession of owner as operating agent, and longshoreman was injured where rung of Jacob's ladder gave way, he was entitled to recover from owner on proof satisfactory to jury that ladder was unseaworthy when ship was delivered to the United States—Cannella v. Lykes Bros. S. S. Co, supra.

required to pay for injuries through unseaworthiness,[24] and a third party, where he is the primary tort-feasor, may be required to indemnify the bare boat charterer for such sums as the charterer might be required to pay,[25] or the charterer may be entitled to contribution.[26] It has been held that an alleged agreement by the owner and charterer that the owner would be responsible for its unseaworthiness is no defense to the demise charterer,[27] and any relief to which the charterer might be entitled can only be obtained in a separate action against the owner, and not in an action by a third party against the owner and charterer.[28]

(3) Liability for Injury to, or Nondelivery of, Cargo

When a charter party operates merely as a contract between the charterer and the shipowner for the conveyance by the latter of goods and merchandise, the owner, as between the charterer and owner, is liable for claims for damage to or shortage of cargo. When a charter party operates as a demise of the ship to the charterer, he is primarily liable for loss of, or injury to, goods shipped on board.

The shipper under an ordinary bill of lading has his remedy against the ship, whether the charter is one where the owner retains possession and command, or whether the control and navigation pass to the charterer;[29] but whether the owner or the charterer is ultimately liable depends on the terms of the charter party.[30] When the charter party operates merely as a contract between the charterer and the shipowner for the conveyance by the latter of goods and merchandise, the owner of the vessel is the carrier of the goods,[31] and the latter, as between the shipowner and charterer, is responsible for claims for damage to, or shortage of, cargo;[32] he will in general be responsible for the nonconveyance of them according to their contract,[33] and is in addition liable to the charterer for any damage to cargo by his servants.[34]

When a charter party operates as a demise or bailment of the ship to the charterer, he becomes the carrier of the goods shipped on board,[35] and is primarily liable for their loss or injury,[36] and in case the vessel is employed by him as a general ship for the conveyance of merchandise, the master is his servant while procuring freight and contracting with third parties for the carriage of merchandise[37] and the general owner consequently cannot be made liable for matters arising out of, or founded on, such contracts.[38] Where the charterer becomes owner pro hac vice, he cannot recover from the owner for a shortage in delivery of, or damage to, the cargo.[39] He alone is personally liable for injury to, or nondelivery of, the cargo,[40] unless the owner has by his conduct induced a reasonable belief in the shipper that the vessel was to sail on his account, and under his direction and control;[41] and this is true, even though the cargo owner had no notice of the terms of the charter.[42] It is immaterial to the question of liability whether the owner receives for the use of the vessel a stipulated sum or a share of its earnings,[43] although it has been held that a party hiring a vessel to another at a specified price per day for the purpose of transporting the latter's own goods at his own charges is not responsible for the goods as carrier.[44]

The vessel or owner, where acting as bailee to transport for hire, is bound only to exercise reasonable care,[45] for the rules governing bailees' responsibility apply,[46] and negligence must be shown.[47] The owner and charterer may be jointly and severally liable for damage to the cargo,[48] as where the damage to the cargo would not have occurred but for their joint negligence.[49]

Unseaworthiness. Even under a charter party amounting to a demise, although the charterer is liable to a shipper for injury to goods, as between himself and the shipowner, the latter is ultimately liable where the injury arises from the vessel's unseaworthiness when furnished to the charterer, in the absence of any specific stipulation to the contrary in the charter party.[50] Where a vessel is unseaworthy on delivery to the charterer, the owner is primarily liable and the charterer secondarily liable for loss, of, or injury to, the cargo,[51] even though there is no privity between the owner and the cargo,[52] and the charterer is entitled to be exonerated by the owner.[53] Where, however, the vessel is seaworthy when delivered, but an accident happens because of unseaworthiness while the vessel is in the possession of the charterer, the charterer is liable,[54] or, according to some decisions

Incorporation of provisions of statute

A vessel owner did not, by incorporating in charter party provisions of Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, convert the contract of carriage from that of a private to a "common carrier" in effect assuming obligation of an insurer, since all that owner did by agreeing to become subject to provisions of the act was to contract that his liability as private carrier might be different from that which the law would otherwise impose.—The Temple Bar, D.C.Md., 45 F.Supp. 608, affirmed, C.C.A., 137 F.2d 293.

Condition ascertainable only on close inspection

A charterer of private carrier barge was not liable for cargo lost when barge sprang a leak and had to be beached because of her unseaworthiness consisting of rotten planking where barge was loaded and showed no signs of leaking for about twenty hours before accident, and condition of planking was ascertainable only on close inspection.—The Doyle, C.C.A.Pa., 105 F.2d 113.

on the question, at least primarily liable.[55] Under statute, the charterer may become liable for the loss of cargo because of lack of diligence in failing to ascertain whether the vessel was seaworthy or to make it seaworthy.[56]

(4) Liability for Supplies, Repairs, and Materials

If the charterer is owner pro hac vice, he is liable for repairs, materials, and supplies for the vessel, and the owner is absolved from liability therefor.

In the absence of specific stipulations in the charter party, the owner is liable as a general rule for all supplies furnished his ship,[57] and for repairs thereon;[58] but, if the charterer is owner pro hac vice, he is liable for repairs, materials, and supplies for the vessel,[59] and the owner is absolved from liability therefor,[60] although he has reserved the right to terminate the charter party at any time.[61]

Regardless of the nature of the charter party, the parties may specifically agree that certain specified supplies, materials, and repairs shall be furnished by the one party or the other, and, in such a case, as between the parties, the obligation to furnish them rests on the party whose performance in that particular is stipulated for by the contract;[62] but the liability with respect to supplies, repairs, and materials not included in the terms of the specific agreement remains subject to the general rules governing liability for items furnished to a chartered vessel.[63] A clause providing that the owner shall keep the vessel in good condition and tackled and appareled with all things necessary for the voyage extends no further than to make the general owner liable to the charterer by way of reimbursement for supplies and materials furnished to keep the vessel in proper condition,[64] and is not available to persons furnishing such materials and supplies to compel satisfaction of their claims by the owner of a demised vessel.[65]

The fact that the general owner has not given to the person furnishing the supplies any notice of the nature of the charterer's interest in the vessel does not extend his personal liability.[66] The person furnishing supplies which, by the charter, the charterer is to provide or pay for has no claim against the vessel or the owner, although he did not know the charter terms, at least, if by the exercise of reasonable diligence, he might have discovered them and has not exercised such diligence,[67] although, if there is no failure in this respect on his part, he may hold the vessel for items furnished,[68] and the vessel and the owners are subrogated in such a situation to a claim against the charterer for the materials furnished.[69]

a. In General

Generally, everyone who offers a vessel for charter is bound to furnish one that is staunch, tight, and seaworthy, and a warranty of seaworthiness of the vessel, if it is not expressly affirmed or excluded, is implied in the charter.

Generally, everyone who offers a vessel for charter is bound to furnish one that is staunch, tight, and seaworthy, and a warranty of seaworthiness of the vessel, if it is not expressly affirmed or excluded, is implied in the charter,[71] and, where the charter is extended, the implied warranty applies to the extension thereof.[72] The warranty of seaworthiness extends to a lighterage contract,[73] to the rental of a lighter to act as part of the wharf for unloading a cargo[74] or for storage of goods to await the clearance of a wharf,[75] to the rental of barges for the storage of cargo pending repairs to a ship,[76] or to a charter of a crane for the purpose of lifting property from a dock to a vessel.[77] The duty to have the vessel seaworthy is a nondelegable duty of the owner,[78] and it applies whether a charter is executed by himself or by his agent.[79] The fact that the owner does not deal directly with the charterer, but makes the arrangement through a third person, does not alter his liability on an implied warranty of seaworthiness where he is aware of the use which is to be made of the vessel.[80]

Fitness for purpose. Where the owner of a vessel charters her, he is, in the absence of a stipulation to the contrary, bound to see that she is suitable for the service in which she is to be employed,[81] or the purpose for which she is intended,[82] and for the kind of cargo which she is chartered to carry.[83] Where the vessel owner is kept in ignorance of how the vessel is to be employed or where it is to be sent, there can be no implied warranty of fitness for the particular service;[84] and there is no implied warranty of fitness where the charterer misrepresents the depth of the channel in which she is to navigate[85]

Known or unknown; latent or patent defects. The warranty of seaworthiness is absolute and not conditional,[86] and the owner, where there is no stipulation to the contrary, is bound whether the defects are known or unknown to him.[87] However, not every defect needing repair or causing damages amounts to a breach of the warranty,[88] and, where the defects are patent and the charterer has an opportunity to examine the vessel, it has been held that there is no implied warranty,[89] although the rule is otherwise as to defects which are not so open.[90] The charterer assumes the obligation that the vessel will continue to be capable to proceed on her voyage, so far as relates to all defects which can be ascertained by inspection, and the owner assumes the obligation that the vessel will continue to be able to proceed, so far as relates to latent defects; if an accident which interrupts the progress of the boat is the result of a defect which is ascertainable by inspection, then the owner can recover, but if of a defect which was latent, then the verdict must be for the charterers[91] Further, an injury to cargo for which the vessel may be liable need not be apparent before its delivery[92]

In the case of a subcharter, the warranty attaches in favor of the subcharterer as against the original charterer,[93] although the original charter places the risk of fitness on the charterer.[94] The owner of the ship who has no contract relation with the subcharterer does not expressly or impliedly warrant the seaworthiness of the ship,[95] and owes no absolute duty to the subcharterer to have the ship seaworthy,[96] but such owner may be liable to the subcharterer on the ground of negligence in furnishing an unseaworthy ship, as discussed supra § 30.

Private or common carrier. Although the fact that the charterer is to occupy the entire ship may prevent the vessel from being regarded as a common carrier, as discussed supra § 34, no distinction arises as far as the obligation of seaworthiness is concerned.[97]

Waiver. Acceptance of performance of a covenant to clean the vessel does not waive a general warranty of fitness,[98] and a release of known damages does not release owners for damages unknown at the time.[99]

Recovery of cargo. On a breach of warranty of seaworthiness, a charterer may maintain a suit to recover possession of the cargo, notwithstanding he may have sold it to arrive at the port of destination where the sale has been repudiated and the bill of lading returned to the charterer.[1]

b. Requisites and Essentials worthy must have proper equipment,[3] and it must be reasonably fit for the receipt[4] and the transportation[5] of the particular cargo or for the performance of the particular service.[6] "Seaworthiness" is a comparative or relative term[7] which takes into account the vessel, voyage, and the cargo,[8] and the requirements vary with the nature of the cargo,[9] the type of vessel,[10] and the character of the voyage,[11] and each case must be determined according to its own facts.[12] A vessel may be seaworthy as to one sort of cargo and unseaworthy as to another,[13] or may be seaworthy for harbor uses and not seaworthy for ocean carriage.[14] A vessel is unseaworthy where it is unable to withstand the ordinary strains of loading or discharge.[15] The warranty of seaworthiness is practically a warranty that the vessel is in such a fit condition for all the ordinary hazards of the contemplated voyage as to be approved as seaworthy in the judgment of impartial, competent, and experienced men versed in that business.[16]

Officers and crew. It is a requisite to the fulfillment of the obligation of the owner to keep his vessel seaworthy during the voyage that she shall be furnished with an adequate number of persons of competent skill and ability to navigate her.[17] The owner must supply a competent master[18] and crew,[19] adequate in number,[20] for the voyage with respect to its length and other particulars,[21] and, on a long voyage, the owners must provide for such a contingency as the death of a captain by employing a mate competent to take his place.[22] It has been stated that, where pilotage is customary at a port, a pilot is available, and the nature of the navigation requires one, it is required that a competent local pilot be on board the ship to render her seaworthy at the inception of the voyage;[23] but the absence of a pilot does not under all circumstances render the vessel unseaworthy,[24] and where it was shown that the pilot was not dropped until after the ship had been put on a proper course and that the master was familiar with the port, it was held that the vessel was not to be regarded as unseaworthy.[25]

Insurability; Lloyd's classification. The impossibility of obtaining insurance on the vessel or cargo is not sufficient in itself to establish a breach of the warranty of seaworthiness.[26] The classification of a vessel for the purposes of insurance does not make a vessel seaworthy,[27] and the absence of such a classification does not make her unseaworthy.[28] Unless the charter requires the owner to maintain the classification, the classification stated in the charter party is merely a matter of description which, if true at the beginning of the adventure, satisfies the owner's obligation in that respect.[29]

Capacity. A vessel which by reason of any weakness is unable to carry the full cargo which her measurements and tonnage entitle her to carry is to be deemed unseaworthy.[30] A steamer built on finer lines than usual, so as to render her more tender than other vessels of her class, is not liable to a time charterer for inability to take a weather deck cargo, although the charterer is entitled to "the whole reach of the vessel's holds, decks, and usual places of loading," unless she is allowed the necessary additional ballast.[31]

Ballasting. In the absence of a provision to the contrary in the charter, the duty is on the owner to supply the ballast necessary to enable his ship to proceed safely on the contemplated voyage.[32] A charter party which provides that the vessel shall in every way be fitted for the voyage includes the furnishing of necessary ballast,[33] and the proper ballasting of the vessel;[34] but, where a water-ballast ship is so described in the charter and delivered to the charterer, it is the duty of the charterer to furnish extra ballast, if necessary, to enable the vessel to carry a deck cargo.[35] Where the charterer is required to furnish free ballast to stiffen the ship to enable her to proceed to her loading port, the expense of removing such ballast, in the absence of a provision to the contrary in the charter, falls on the vessel as between it and the charterer,[36] unless the removal and consequent expense are necessitated by the unfit character of the material furnished by the charterer.[37]

Cleansing from former cargo. In the absence of an agreement to the contrary, the owner is bound to see that the vessel is so cleansed from the carriage of a previous cargo as to prevent damage to a cargo for the carriage of which it is chartered.[38] Where the charterer agrees to clean the vessel, the implied warranty of seaworthiness is only to the effect that it will be suitable for the contemplated use when properly cleaned,[39] and the vessel or owner is not responsible for inadequate cleaning.[40] The charterer may not complain that

Knowledge of safe capacity

With respect to liability of the owner of a box barge which was made unseaworthy by overloading and which sank after heavy seas had broken the hatchcovers, the owner of a cargo of coal, who as charterer loaded the barge with less than its represented carrying capacity, was not chargeable with knowledge of what the barge could safely carry in a certain month, although the cargo owner had previously, but always earlier in the year, shipped cargoes of coal on the barge larger than the amount thereon at the time of the sinking—Petition of Howard, D.C.N.Y., 53 F.Supp. 556.

he required more time to clean the vessel under the agreement than was allowed him by the charter.[41]

Stowage of cargo. The requirement of seaworthiness includes seaworthiness with respect to stowage of the cargo,[42] and, in the absence of special agreement, the vessel must supply proper fittings for the carriage of a lawful cargo,[43] such as proper shifting boards[44] or dunnage;[45] but the rule applies only to the ship and such equipment as is called for by the charter party,[46] and does not apply to cribbing constructed by the charterer for his own convenience for the purpose of securing a deck load, enlarging the ship's structural capacity for cargo beyond what she would otherwise naturally and reasonably take.[47] The rule that responsibility for the seaworthiness of a chartered ship is on the shipowner, as discussed supra subdivision a of this section, does not in all instances mean responsibility for her seaworthiness in respect of stowing cargo.[48] In the case of a time charter, where the charterer booked the freight, designated the places of stowage, did the stowing himself through his own stevedore, and assumed all responsibility therefor, as between the charterer and the ship, the charterer was held liable.[49] A charterer, who has relied on the owner's warranty with respect to the capacity of the vessel, is not chargeable with lack of care for overloading the vessel and rendering it unseaworthy, when the load is within the warranted capacity.[50] Where one half of the damages were imposed on the charterer for the loss of a deck cargo and the only question presented was whether the denial of the liability of the ship for the entire loss was correct, it was held that, whether or not the top-heaviness of the vessel contributed to the loss of the deck load, the collapse of cribbing which was constructed by the charterer was a contributing cause for which liability should be imposed on the charterer.[51]

c. Time and Maintenance of Seaworthiness

As a general rule, the warranty requires seaworthiness of the vessel when entering on the performance of the charter, or delivery into the charter service, and extends to the time when the vessel actually sails or breaks ground for the voyage. The owner is bound to keep the vessel in proper repair unless prevented by perils of the sea or unavoidable accident.

Although it has been held that the undertaking of the owner, in the absence of a stipulation to the contrary, is that the vessel is seaworthy at the date of the charter and the commencement of the loading,[52] or at the date of the charter and of delivery to the charterer,[53] as a general rule, the warranty requires seaworthiness of the vessel when entering on the performance of the charter,[54] or delivery into the charter service,[55] and the requirement of seaworthiness extends to the time when the vessel actually sails or breaks ground for the voyage,[56] and not merely to the time when she begins to take in cargo.[57] Where the charter stipulates that it shall begin when the vessel is ready to receive cargo at the place of loading, the warranty of seaworthiness does not attach until that time.[58] Gen-

Commencement of loading until breaking ground

Although it is stated that the warranty is a double one in that the ship shall be fit to receive cargo when receiving it, and shall be fit to sail at the time of sailing, the warranties are not so momentary but, on the contrary, there is a general warranty of seaworthiness which continues in operation from the commencement of loading operation until the breaking of ground.—The Fred E. erally, the fitness of the vessel under the warranty of seaworthiness does not cover conditions arising after the vessel breaks ground which are beyond the owner's control,[59] and the owner's duty with respect to seaworthiness does not involve a continuing warranty.[60] There is no implied warranty that the vessel will remain seaworthy during the charter term[61] or after the commencement of the voyage,[62] although, by express provision in the charter, the owner may extend the warranty of seaworthiness at the beginning of the voyage to seaworthiness throughout the voyage.[63]

Under a time charter, the charterer is entitled to rely on a warranty of seaworthiness at the beginning of each voyage.[64] So, where the owners are required to maintain the vessel in a thoroughly efficient manner in hull and machinery for and during the service, the maintenance clause imports a warranty of seaworthiness at the commencement of each voyage under the charter.[65] Under a charter providing that the vessel shall be tight, staunch, and strong, and shall in every way be fitted for the usual cargo service and be maintained in the same state and class by the owners during the duration of the service, the shipowner is liable for damages due to the vessel's unseaworthiness caused by his lack of diligence to make her fit.[66]

Repairs. The owner is bound to keep the vessel in proper repair unless prevented by perils of the sea or unavoidable accident.[67] Where the vessel is sufficient at the beginning of the voyage, although the hirer must not abandon the vessel while he can keep her afloat and suitably provide for the employment and destination for which she was hired, the owner must be ready to pay all expenses and damages necessarily incurred for the purpose of keeping her in fit condition.[68] Where a vessel becomes leaky or unfit for the sea after she sets sail, the shippers are obliged to wait a reasonable time until she is repaired at any intermediate port where she may call for that purpose unless another vessel is prepared to carry on the cargo to the port of destination.[69] Where a vessel chartered for a voyage becomes disabled by accident while taking in her cargo, the freighters will not be bound by the charter party unless she is repaired and rendered fit for the voyage within a reasonable time,[70] and it has been held that, where the goods are obliged to be put on shore by reason of the accident, they are not compelled to wait until the vessel is again made seaworthy at the risk of losing a foreign market.[71]

Under a charter requiring the owners to maintain the vessel in thoroughly efficient state in hull and machinery for and during the service, the owners, where no time is fixed within which repairs must be made, are required to exercise only ordinary and reasonable care to restore the vessel to a fairly efficient state for her service,[72] and are not responsible for delay prolonged by the negligence of an experienced reputable and fully equipped ship repair concern employed by them.[73] Such a covenant is fully performed if every defect and want of suitable repair are remedied as soon as by the use of due and reasonable diligence they could be discovered and proper opportunity had to repair and make the vessel seaworthy.[74] Where the owner is bound to maintain the vessel in a seaworthy condition by an express covenant in the charter party, he has the right and duty to make repairs needed to make the vessel seaworthy before she proceeds to sea again after the completion of a voyage.[75]

the otherwise absolute warranty of seaworthiness is reduced to an obligation to use due diligence only.

The provisions of the Harter Act or the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, exempting owners or charterers from loss resulting from faults or errors in navigation or in the management of the vessel and from certain other designated causes, do not imply that because the owner is thus exempted when he has been duly diligent that the law also relieves him from the duty of furnishing a seaworthy vessel,[76] and such result does not follow from the provision of the statute allowing the owner, where he has used due diligence to furnish a seaworthy ship, to contract against the obligation of seaworthiness.[77] Where, however, the Harter Act or the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act has been expressly incorporated in the charter, the otherwise absolute warranty of seaworthiness is reduced to an obligation to use due diligence only,[78] and the shipowner is not liable for unseaworthiness, unless it results from lack of due diligence,[79] or for latent defects not discoverable by due diligence.[80]

The kind of diligence which is required is the making of an inspection or test which would ordinarily or customarily be made,[81] and it comprehends something more than a casual inspection.[82] If the owner is satisfied to rely on external appearances that the vessel and her appliances are in such good order that it is safe to take cargo aboard, instead of making tests and examination, the owner assumes the responsibility for such defects as may exist and which a diligent examination would reveal.[83] However, it has been held that the inclusion of the statute in a charter party could not invalidate a stipulation that the duties of the ship should be different in a given particular from the duties under maritime law,[84] and that the specific clause will survive,[85] but it has also been held that a charter provision is inapplicable if it is inconsistent with the warranty of seaworthiness and the obligation to use due diligence to make the vessel seaworthy.[86]

Under the fire statute, which in terms protects an owner from loss by fire occurring on board a vessel, unless the fire was caused by design or neglect of the owner, a fire occasioned by reason of the fact that a vessel is not made seaworthy before the commencement of the voyage is to be regarded as occasioned by the owner's neglect so that he is not entitled to the exemption of the statute.[87]

Risk of stowage

Under charter party for carriage of cargo of ammonia sulphate in which statute was incorporated and which made shipper responsible for loading and stowage and put risk of stowage on vessel's skin on shipper, private carrier was held not liable to shipper for damage to cargo stowed on skin of barge without dunnage, caused when ammonia sulphate sifted through small cracks of ceiling of the hold into bilge water, forming mixture which choked pumps so that water rose above ceiling and wet lower part of cargo.—The Westmoreland, C.C.A.N.Y., 86 F.2d 96.

e. Contractual Limitation or Abrogation of Owner's Liability

A warranty of seaworthiness may be negatived only by express contract, and a provision in a charter contemplating the release of the owner from his implied warranty of seaworthiness for the service undertaken must be plain and unequivocal. Contractual provisions or exceptions exempting the owner from the general obligation of furnishing a seaworthy vessel will not be extended by construction to apply to a state of seaworthiness existing at the commencement of the voyage.

A warranty of seaworthiness may be negatived only by express contract,[88] and a provision in a charter contemplating the release of the owner from his implied warranty of seaworthiness for the service undertaken must be plain and unequivocal.[89] Contractual provisions or exceptions exempting the owner from the general obligation of furnishing a seaworthy vessel will not be extended by construction to apply to a state of unseaworthiness existing at the commencement of the voyage,[90] and, if the owner desires the exemption to cover a condition of unseaworthiness then existing, he must unequivocally so contract,[91] but it has been held, under a charter party exempting the shipowners from liability for accidents of machinery, that the ship and its owner are relieved from liability for accidents occuring to the machinery after making the charter party, even if the ship was unseaworthy at the time the charter party was made and the vessel delivered to the charterer.[92]

The implied warranty of seaworthiness is not done away with by a less comprehensive express warranty,[93] and the implied warranty of seaworthiness at the time the voyage begins is not varied by an express warranty that the vessel shall be staunch, strong, etc., for the voyage.[94] However, a charter provision, which warranted the vessel on delivery as seaworthy so far as due diligence can make her so, has been held a limited, not an absolute, warranty of seaworthiness,[95] and such a warranty relieves the owner from liability for latent defects unless there was a failure to use due diligence.[96] It has also been held that an agreement that the vessel shall be kept tight, staunch, well fitted, and tackled for a particular voyage excludes a warranty by the owners that she be seaworthy at the commencement of the charter party or that she should continue so during the term,[97] but if any defect or want of suitable repair is remedied as soon as by the use of due diligence it could be discovered and proper opportunity had to repair the vessel and make her seaworthy, such covenant is performed[98]

The provisions in a charter party that all damages and accidents of whatever nature should be mutually excepted during the currency of the present charter party, provided they did not result from lack of diligence of the owners or managers of the vessel, has been held to refer to a failure of diligence by those employed by the owners or managers to make the vessel seaworthy,[99] as well as to the failure of personal diligence of the owners or managers,[1] and, where the shipowners fail in their duty of using due diligence, they are liable to the charterer.[2] Where a provision requiring the vessel to be docked, bottom cleaned, and painted when the charterer deems necessary is stricken from the charter, the charterer cannot take the chance of the bottom becoming foul if the vessel trades in tropical waters and then hold the owner liable therefor under a distinct provision of general fitness in the charter.[3]

f. Assumption of Risk

The existence of an implied warranty of seaworthiness does not necessarily exclude the doctrine of assumption of risk of unseaworthiness by the charterer.

The existence of an implied warranty of seaworthiness does not necessarily exclude the doctrine of assumption of risk of unseaworthiness by the charterer[4] and where, notwithstanding the unseaworthiness is apparent, the charterer, although he has power to prevent it, allows the loading of cargo to proceed and the vessel to depart in its unfit condition, he assumes the risk of loss through unseaworthiness.[5] The fact that the charterer agrees to assume full responsibility for the vessel and to return it in good working order and repair does not preclude him from the benefit of the implied warranty of seaworthiness.[6]

g. Rejection of Unseaworthy Vessel

Where a vessel is unfit to enter on the service for which it is chartered, the charterers are justified in returning it.

Where a vessel is unfit to enter on the service for which it is chartered, the charterers are justified in returning it;[7] so, where several impartial, competent, and experienced persons, agents of various underwriters, have, after examination of a vessel, expressed the belief that she is not seaworthy, and the owner has refused to dock the vessel and settle the question, the charterers are justified in rejecting her, notwithstanding the subsequent good performance of the ship.[8]

Provision for cancellation. Under a charter which warrants a vessel to be tight, staunch, and strong and in every way fit for the service, and which gives the charterer the right to cancel if she becomes defective for service, the vessel is not required to be perfect, but must be in good condition and efficient and reasonably safe for the service which is required of her.[9] Where a charter gives the charterers the option to cancel the charter on the vessel's failure to report for cargo on or before a specified date, unseaworthiness of the vessel at the time the charter was entered into is not a ground for cancellation of the charter, notwithstanding the warranty of seaworthiness, if the vessel is put in seaworthy condition before such date;[10] on the other hand, where a charter party gives the charterers the option to cancel the charter on the failure of a vessel chartered as an auxiliary schooner to report for cargo on or before a specified date, and on such date the auxiliary engines have not been connected with the oil tanks, or assembled, the charterers may cancel the charter under a provision of the charter warranting seaworthiness.[11]

h. Damages

All damages which flow naturally from a breach of warranty of seaworthiness may be recovered by the charterer.

All damages which flow naturally from a breach of warranty of seaworthiness may be recovered by the charterer.[12] If the speed of the vessel is not up to the charter requirements, and in consequence the cargo is injured, the charterer may recover damages measured by the deterioration of the cargo due to delay;[13] but damages are not recoverable for delay due to accidents excepted under a charter party.[14] Where, in the case of a shipment of cattle by reason of the unseaworthiness of the vessel, they were not delivered at the time when, and place where, they should have been, it was held that a recovery may be had for loss through shrinkage in weight from the protracted voyage,[15] and through fall in market value during the delay in arriving.[16]

Where it is known to both of the parties that a cargo is of a perishable nature, the owner of a vessel which becomes unseaworthy on the voyage to the port of loading is liable to the charterer for damage resulting to the cargo from the inability of the vessel to take it or from delay in making repairs, where the disability of the vessel is not reported to the charterer on her arrival at the port of loading.[17] If a vessel proving unseaworthy after leaving port is obliged to return to the port and abandon the voyage, the charterer is entitled to recover the value of the fuel consumed on the uncompleted voyage.[18] There is no implied promise in a charter party for the owner to reimburse the hirer for casual profits lost by his advancing money to pay for necessary repairs on the vessel.[19]

Proximate cause. The owner cannot be charged with damages for delay in delivering the vessel to the charterer, which is not occasioned by its fault.[20]

Effect of insurance. The charterers may recover from the owners the whole amount of a loss occasioned by unseaworthiness, although the underwriters have already paid part of the loss[21] or have paid the full loss.[22]

Refusal of vessel. Where, by reason of the unfitness of the vessel, the charterers are justified in returning it to the owner, they are entitled to recover such actual damages as they may have sustained [23]

§ 37. Readiness and Dispatch of Vessel

a. In general
b. Delay in sailing for, or arrival at, port of loading
c. Dispatch money

a. In General

The vessel must be tendered and ready for loading at the time and place specified in the charter.

The vessel must be tendered[24] and ready for loading[25] at the time and place specified in the charter. If there is no express provision as to the time a chartered vessel shall be tendered at the designated port, the vessel must proceed to the port named in the charter and tender services within a reasonable time,[26] and for refusal to accept such services the charterer may be liable for a breach of his contract, as discussed infra § 48; but there is no breach of the charterer's contract to load until the lay days provided for therein have expired.[27] Provisions in a charter party that a vessel should be in readiness to receive cargo so that lay days would commence not later than a certain date are of the essence of the contract,[28] and, if the vessel is tendered so that lay days commence after such date, the charterer is not bound to receive the vessel [29] If necessary, the vessel must wait for cargo at the port of loading during all the agreed lay days,[30] but, where the charterer refuses to accept the vessel or provide a cargo, the owner need not keep her in readiness for delivery during all the lay days.[31]

The charterer's right to cancel, where the ship chartered is not ready to sail by a stipulated time, does not imply a promise by the owners to tender the ship on or before that day,[32] and the charterer, in addition to cancellation, cannot recover damages.[33] However, the shipowner is bound to send the ship to the loading port,[34] even though it is obvious that she cannot arrive before the cancellation date,[35] and the charterer cannot be compelled to say how he will exercise his option until such date.[36]

b. Delay in Sailing for, or Arrival at, Port of Loading

The vessel must sail to enter on the charter at the port of loading at the time stipulated, such stipulation being construed as a condition precedent or warranty, which, if not fulfilled, entitles the charterer to reject the vessel.

The vessel must sail to enter on the charter at the port of loading at the time stipulated,[37] such stipulation being construed as a condition precedent or warranty which, if not fulfilled, entitles the charterer to reject the vessel,[38] or, in some cases to recover damages,[39] unless the delay was caused by the fault of the charterer,[40] or he has waived his right by failing to object[41] or by loading the cargo.[42] In the absence of an express stipulation as to the time a vessel will sail, one is implied,[43] and the vessel must proceed with reasonable dispatch to the port named in the charter.[44] The parties may be relieved from the contract when arrival of chartered ship is delayed by causes mutually excepted in the charter party,[45] as by inevitable accident,[46] perils of the sea,[47] or public enemy,[48] but the vessel is bound to proceed with reasonable diligence[49] on the contract as soon as the cause of delay is removed,[50] the charterer will be bound to accept if the master used reasonable diligence in bringing her to port,[51] and if the vessel is tendered within a reasonable time[52] A forcible detention will excuse from the performance of the obligation created by law,[53] and it seems that a charterer will be excused from performance if his object has been defeated by the vessel's delay.[54]

c. Dispatch Money

Dispatch money arises purely from contract, and is a premium paid the charterer by the vessel for days saved which may be used in completing the voyage.

Dispatch money arises purely from contract,[55] and is a premium paid the charterer by the vessel for days saved which may be used in completing the voyage;[56] it is a premium offered for hastening a definite task.[57] Under a charter party so providing, if the cargo shall be laden or discharged at an earlier date than is specified, the charterer shall be entitled to dispatch money,[58] which shall be com-

Mistake in deduction from freight

Charterer could recover from owners balance of dispatch money which charterer's clerk, through careless mistake in computation of lay days, failed to deduct from freight, as such mistake in computation was not a

puted at a rate per diem or pro rata for any part of a day saved.[59] The time saved to the ship in loading or discharging depends on the charter provisions,[60] and, where time saved is not definitely defined in the charter party, the time saved must be left to a construction of the charter party,[61] which is to be determined by the lex loci contractus,[62] except where the place of performance is in a foreign country.[63] Thus, it has been stated in construing particular provisions that the time saved is only the time comprised between the time when the loading or discharging is actually completed and the time when the lay days expire,[64] or the lay days remaining unused,[65] or the time saved to the vessel from the time allowed for loading,[66] or all time saved to the ship, and not merely time saved in loading.[67]

In determining the time saved for which dispatch money is due, it may be necessary to determine or compute the time allowed for loading or discharging, namely, the lay days,[68] and, where the contract is express as to the time the lay days are to commence, it controls,[69] even though the loading or discharging may actually begin before the stipulated time.[70] Notice of readiness to load or discharge may be required before laying time begins,[71] but notice is unnecessary where the charterer has actual notice and loading begins,[72] or where the terms of the contract do not require it.[73] Provisions of the charter that the ship is to load in the usual and customary manner or according to the custom of the port apply only to the manner of loading and not to the time of loading,[74] especially where the charter party allows a specified number of running lay days, Sundays and holidays, even if used, excluded for loading.[75]

The method of computing lay days is subject to the control of contract provisions relative thereto.[76]

Availability of cargo

Charterer's obligation to load commenced only when cargo became available, with respect to computation of dispatch money, where owners under charter party had privilege of canceling contract or waiting on owners' time in case of nonavailability of cargo.—The West Nosska, D.C.N.Y., 2 F.Supp. 547.

Free time

(1) Where charter party provided lay days for loading, if required by charterer, were not to commence before ninety-six hours, charterer was allowed free time only if required.—U. S. v. Gano-Moore Co., D.C.Pa., 35 F.2d 395.

(2) Charter party providing for free time at discharging port was held to give free time at each unloading port.—South American Metal Co. v. Kjoge, C.C.A.Va., 12 F.2d 562.

(3) Under charter party providing for seventy-two-hour period before lay days begin to run, Saturday afternoon, Sunday, and Armistice Day will not be added to seventy-two-hour period in determining dispatch money, Sundays and legal holidays not being excepted from seventy-two-hour clause.—South American Metal Co. v. Kjoge, supra.

Port closed at night

Where lay days were to commence twenty-four hours after arrival at or off discharging port, lay days for unloading cargo on ship arriving at night do not commence to run until 7 o'clock on morning following, at port legally closed until 7 A.M.—South American Metal Co. v. Kjoge, supra.

Notice on holidays

Under charter providing that Sundays and holidays shall not count as lay days, and that charterer might cancel charter if vessel was not ready on or before a particular holiday, it has been held that, although the latter provision seemed to make the particular holiday available for the purpose of giving notice, a notice given on that day was inoperative and lay days commenced second day thereafter.—The Unionist, supra.

76. U.S.—The Driebergen, C.C.A.

Thus, it has been held, that where the charter specifies the number of days allowed for loading, exclusive of Sundays and holidays, and provides that dispatch is to be allowed the charterer for each running day or part of a day saved in loading, the dispatch is to be computed on the difference between the time when the loading was actually completed and the vessel turned over to the master for the purpose of the voyage, and the time when the lay days for loading would have expired under the charter, including Sundays and holidays occurring during such time;[77] but the charterer cannot have dispatch for any time elapsing after the vessel was loaded but unable to sail because the charterer withheld the clearance papers unjustifiably.[78]

Prima facie the presumption is that the object and intention of dispatch clauses are that the shipowner shall pay to the charterer for all time saved to the ship, calculated in the way in which, in the converse case, demurrage, would be calculated,[79] that is, taking no account of the lay-day exception,[80] but this presumption may be displaced,[81] and it is displaced where either lay days and time saved by dispatch are dealt with in the same clause and demurrage in another clause,[82] or lay days, time saved by dispatch, and demurrage are dealt with in the same clause.[83] Hence, where lay days, demurrage, and dispatch money are dealt with in different clauses,[84] or lay days are dealt with in one clause and dispatch and demurrage in another,[85] and nothing in the collocation of the words, or otherwise, indicates that the days saved are used in the same sense as the lay days, as described in the lay day clause,[86] dispatch money is payable for all time saved to the ship including Sundays and holidays.

Under particular provisions of the charter party it has been held that a loss of time at one port may be offset against a saving at another port.[87] Under a charter party providing that the time allowed for loading and discharging is to be reversible, a charterer electing to pool the lay days is only entitled to add to the lay days allowed for discharging the lay days saved in loading,[88] and not days saved other than lay days.[89]

Settlements of dispatch money made by the master of the ship in accordance with the rights of the parties will generally be held to be binding on the shipowner,[90] especially where it is shown that the

Bad weather

Under charter providing for loading and unloading of specified tons per day, during working days, Sundays and bad weather, etc., being excepted, term "bad weather" is construed to include weather not fit or reasonably safe for loading by reason of the state of the sea as well as of the atmosphere, and the days during which there was such weather must be deducted from the time taken in loading and discharging in computing the amount of dispatch money.—The Ocean Prince, D.C.N.Y., 50 F. 115.

Clearance day

Charter party providing that charterers might finish loading on day steamer was cleared without counting it as lay day used, "neither shall it count for dispatch money," requires that clearance days used for loading should be considered as lay days used, for purpose of computing dispatch money—The Driebergen, C.C.A.Fla., 60 F.2d 367—The Twilight, D.C.Ala., 194 F. 926—The Muirfield, D.C.Fla., 174 F. 75.

Holidays

(1) Whether Saturday was to be deemed a half holiday for purpose of calculating dispatch money under English charter party was to be decided by local law of port of discharge in Massachusetts—George E. Warren Corp. v. Britain S. S. Co., C.C.A.Mass., 100 F.2d 283.

(2) Under charter provisions excluding Sundays and holidays, holiday time, as fixed by the statute of the port of loading, will not be included in the running days—Holman v. Gans S. S. Line, N.Y., 186 F. 96, 108 C.C.A. 208.

Weather working days

(1) Weather working day is a day otherwise a working day, according to the custom of the port, on which the weather permits loading—The Driebergen, C.C.A.Fla., 60 F.2d 367.

(2) Where lay days are weather working days, failure to show custom of port with respect to ordinary working hours, or effect of rain during morning, may prevent determination whether day was lay day within charter party.—The Driebergen, supra.

charterer and the shipowner ratified the settlement made between the charterer's agent and the master of the ship;[91] but a document signed by the master of the ship stating the time saved in loading and discharging, especially if signed under protest, cannot vary the provisions of the charter party as to the method of computing time saved for the purpose of calculating dispatch money,[92] and such a document signed by the master of a ship, unless for the purpose of effecting a settlement of the amount of the dispatch money, cannot be regarded as altering the rights of the parties under the charter party,[93] as the owner could not be bound by the action of the master to such an extent without authority.[94]

Right of consignee. As a consignee is liable for demurrage, his right to collect dispatch money is reciprocal.[95]

§ 38. Charterer's Duty to Furnish Cargo

In the absence of express stipulation, the duty of the charterer to furnish cargo is an absolute one. The cargo must be of the character described in the charter party and adapted to the character and capacity of the vessel.

In the absence of express stipulations,[96] the duty of the charterer to furnish cargo is an absolute one.[97] When the charterer so agrees, he is bound to furnish and load a full and complete cargo,[98] and for a failure on his part he may be liable for dead freight,[99] unless relieved by a clause in his contract,[1] and he cannot, without a valid reason, refuse to furnish cargo because of the stevedore employed by the master;[2] but where a charter party provides that the vessel is to carry a full load, and places loading under the master's direction, and provides that the charterer shall not be responsible for stowage, the latter is not liable for failure to take a full cargo resulting from defective stowage.[3] The charterer may not be liable for full damages if the shipowner makes no effort to load cargo in space left vacant by the charterer.[4]

The charterer must furnish cargo as required by the charter,[5] within the time specified in the charter,[6] and a charter party which has been rendered void by the charterer's failure to furnish cargo within such time cannot be revived by a subsequent tender.[7] Where no definite time is fixed in the charter party in which cargo is to be furnished for loading by the charterer, the law will presume that it was the intention of the parties that the vessel be loaded within a reasonable time.[8] Where the charterer consigns the vessel to the shipper for loading, he is responsible for the failure of the shipper to furnish a full cargo.[9]

Character of cargo to be furnished. The cargo must be of the character described in the charter party[10] and adapted to the character and capacity[11] of the vessel, although the contract to hire covers the entire vessel[12] and provides for the payment of

§ 39. Voyage

a. In general
b. Route; delay and deviation
c. Destination and port of discharge

a. In General

Except as its meaning may be restricted by other provisions of the charter party, the term "voyage" has reference to the whole time during which the vessel is engaged in performing the contract contained in the charter party.

Except as its meaning may be restricted by other provisions of the charter party, the term "voyage" has reference to the whole time during which the vessel is engaged in performing the contract contained in the charter party.[15] There is some conflict in the authorities as to whether the preliminary transit to the port of loading is a part of the voyage, it having been held to be so under the language of particular charters,[16] while under other charters it has been held that the voyage does not begin until the vessel is ready to load or the loading is completed.[17] Where a vessel actually and in fact leaves her port of loading with manifest intent to proceed to her port of destination, her voyage has begun,[18] although she may not have her full crew on board, where those on board are sufficient for the preliminary part of the voyage.[19]

Overlap and underlap. Where a vessel is chartered without any limitation of time, it is an absolute and indefeasible hiring of the vessel for every voyage she shall have undertaken until notice is given by the owner of his intention to discontinue it.[20] After the expiration of a time charter, the charterer has no right to begin a fresh voyage.[21] So, where a vessel is chartered for a series of voyages between specified dates, the charterer cannot enter on a voyage which cannot be completed within the time specified,[22] and he need not furnish a cargo for such a voyage;[23] but where as evidenced by a provision for continuance of hire the charter contemplates the detention of the vessel beyond the charter period, the charterer may, under custom or usage, dispatch the vessel on a voyage mentioned in the charter where any considerable period remains of the charter term, although the voyage cannot be completed within the term.[24] Where the charter contains an option for its extension by the charterer, it has been held that the extended period begins from the completion of a voyage under the original term, although there is an overlap.[25]

Redelivery of vessel. The charter may contain an option permitting the charterer to retain the vessel after the expiration of the original term.[26] Where the charter contains a stipulation for a redelivery of the vessel but no particular place is designated, the charterer is required only to return it to the place from which it is taken,[27] and if the owner has the option to require the vessel to be delivered at either one of two ports, the charterer, on failure of the owner to designate, may tender the vessel at either port.[28] Notice of readiness to deliver is equivalent to actual delivery where the owner does not see fit to come forward and accept the delivery.[29]

b. Route; Delay and Deviation

Where no time is specified in the charter for sailing, the implied obligation is that the vessel shall sail without unnecessary delay, and shall proceed with all reasonable dispatch to her destination, by the route specified in the charter. In the absence of an express provision in the charter, there is an implied warranty that the vessel will not deviate from the customary and usual route unless compelled to do so by necessity.

Where no time is specified in the charter for sailing, the implied obligation is that the vessel shall sail without unnecessary delay,[30] and shall proceed with all reasonable dispatch[31] to her destination, by the route specified in the charter.[32] The conditions of the contract, nature of the cargo, and objects of the voyage may all be considered in determining what is reasonable dispatch.[33]

Deviation. In the absence of an express provision in the charter, there is an implied warranty that the vessel will not deviate from the customary and usual route unless compelled to do so by necessity,[34] and the effect of an unjustified deviation is to displace the contract between the charterer and the vessel owner,[35] a deviation strips a ship of all excuses in her charter party,[36] and imposes on her the liability of a common carrier,[37] which is the liability of an insurer.[38] A necessity occurring at the loading port prior to the inception of the voyage will not excuse a deviation.[39] A deviation is not justified for the purpose of obtaining fuel where the vessel sailed without sufficient fuel,[40] or to obtain more seamen where she sailed without a sufficient crew,[41] but deviation to assist vessels under permission contained in the charter does not subject the owner to any claim.[42] Such a permission must be construed, however, as limited to deviations which do not frustrate the object of the contract.[43] A charter party permitting deviation forced by stress of weather permits a deviation where the vessel is suffering from heavy labor in high seas.[44] The charterer cannot authorize a deviation by a subcharterer from the voyage stipulated in the original charter.[45]

A deviation may be waived by the charterer or he may be estopped to assert it.[46] In determining whether the charterer's inaction after discovering the deviation bars him relief, a distinction must be made between suing for damages arising from the deviation itself, that is for the resulting delay, and suing for a loss on the theory that the contract has ended and the ship is liable as a common carrier.[47] Thus, a charterer would not lose his action for damages due to delayed delivery where he ships with knowledge of the delay,[48] or his privilege of treating the ship as an insurer if he does not learn of the deviation until the goods arrive and he then accepts them.[49] However, if the charterer learns of the deviation while the voyage is in progress, and without protest or reservation of his rights, allows her to make good her fault, so far as she can, he waives the deviation, and cannot sue on the theory that the contract has ended and the ship is liable as a common carrier.[50]

c. Destination and Port of Discharge

A charterer has no right to employ the vessel on a voyage to a port forbidden by the charter, and, on a charter for a voyage to a particular port, he has no contractual right to order the vessel to another port for discharge, unless under an option in the charter party. The charterer, where he has an option to designate the port, must designate a physically safe port.

Exercise of option

Where charter party provided that charterers should "have the option of discharging at two safe ports" and of discharge, the word "port" is taken to mean commercial area as it would be understood by business men in view of the nature of the charter party.[51]

Safe port. The charterer, even in the absence of an express stipulation, such as is ordinarily incorporated in the charter, must, where he has an option to designate the port, designate a physically safe port.[55] In order that a port may be safe, it must be one to which a vessel can get laden as she is and at which she can lie and discharge always afloat.[56] Under a charter requiring the charterers to order the vessel to a safe port, "or as near thereunto as she can safely get, and always lay and discharge afloat," she must be ordered to a port which she can safely enter with her cargo, or which at least has a safe anchorage outside where she can lie and discharge afloat.[57] A requirement in the charter that it must be possible for the vessel safely to lie afloat may be waived.[58] If the consignee and virtual charterer insists on delivery at an unsafe port the master may return with the cargo, if there is no place to store it at the adjacent port.[59] Where bills of lading are given by the master for delivery of the goods at the port named, the shipowner cannot afterward object that it is not a safe port, but must go where he has contracted to go.[60]

§ 40. Receiving and Discharging Cargo

a. Loading and stowage
b. Discharge
c. Employment of stevedore

a. Loading and Stowage

Although under a demise charter the owner is not liable for loss resultant from negligent or unskillful loading or stowage, under a charter party not constituting a demise, in the absence of any agreement or binding custom to the contrary, it is the duty of the owner to load a chartered ship, and he is liable for improper or negligent stowage of cargo, and for injury resulting from defective loading apparatus.

Although under a demise charter the owner is not liable for loss resultant from negligent or unskillful loading or stowage,[61] under a charter party not constituting a demise, in the absence of any agreement[62] or binding custom to the contrary, it is the duty of the owner to load a chartered ship,[63] and this duty applies whether the ships are on time charters or voyage charters.[64] Thus, under a charter party not constituting a demise, except where the responsibility is assumed by the charterer under the agreement,[65] the owner is liable for improper or negligent stowage of cargo,[66] and for injury resulting from defective loading apparatus.[67] Where it is the duty of the charterer under the agreement to load the cargo, the owner is not liable for damages arising from misrepresentations by the charterer to the master concerning the character of the cargo,[68] but it is the duty of the master, when fully cognizant of the facts, to determine when the vessel has taken on as much cargo as is prudent,[69] and the vessel[70] or the owners[71] may be that orders for second port should be given not later than twenty-four hours after arrival at first port, and charterer named a second port, charterer's election became conclusive and owner was not obliged to send the ship to another port of discharge chosen by consignee of cargo within twenty-four hours after arrival at first port—George E Warren Corporation v Picton S S Co., supra.

liable for damage to cargo of which overloading is the proximate cause. When the charterer has taken the entire vessel, he is entitled to all cargo space,[72] except that reserved by the charter for the owner's use,[73] and if the master refuses to load a full cargo under the charter the charterer may recover damages.[74]

Apportionment and placing of cargo. As a general rule, it is for the master of the ship to determine where the articles offered shall be placed and how proportioned,[75] although the ship is loaded by the charterer,[76] and when the charterer offers to furnish goods in sufficient quantities and of the character required by the charter party, it is the master's duty to make known to him what quantity of the several articles is necessary to load the ship as required by the charter party.[77] However, under a charter party in which the charterer agreed to load and stow the cargo at his own expense under the supervision of the master, it has been held that, although the master's duty of supervision might, for some purposes and under some circumstances, be deemed to extend to the erection of cribbing as a means of stowing a deck load, where the vessel is not required to furnish the cribbing there is no duty of ship or master to prevent the charterer from loading the cargo in such manner as to expose it to the dangers ordinarily incident to the transportation on deck.[78]

Departure from charter by master. Although the master may not modify the owner's contract for a positive undertaking,[79] he may make necessary departures from the stipulations of the charter party for the safety of the voyage,[80] such as refusing to load a full cargo,[81] carrying more ballast than that stipulated,[82] and loading below decks instead of above decks,[83] but the charterer is entitled to an allowance for space he may have lost by such changes.[84]

Refusal of cargo in danger of injury. Notwithstanding a provision of the charter party requiring the ship to receive all such lawful cargo as the charterers may think proper to ship,[85] when the owners are responsible for proper stowage and safe carriage, the master is justified in refusing to load goods where there is danger that they will be injured by other cargo previously loaded,[86] and although a charter provides that the whole of a vessel shall be at the charterer's disposal, with the right to put a full cargo on board.[87]

Cargo latently defective. In general, where damage is caused by the stowage of cargo with latent defects, the master cannot be charged with negligence for receiving it.[88]

Time of completion. The charterer will be required to complete loading within the time stipulated.[89]

Loading port. The charterer may be required to designate the loading port[90] and when he does so the charter will be limited to the port designated.[91]

Usage of trade. A charter party for the transportation of a cargo of merchandise which does not prescribe the mode of stowage[92] tacitly refers to the established and known usage of the trade for the manner of stowing cargo [93]

b. Discharge

Under a charter party not constituting a demise, in the absence of any agreement in the contract, or custom binding on the parties to the contrary, it is the duty of the owner to discharge a chartered ship.

Under a charter party not constituting a demise, in the absence of any agreement in the contract,[94] or custom binding on the parties to the contrary,[95] it is the duty of the owner to discharge a chartered ship,[96] whether the ship is on a time charter or a voyage charter,[97] at the berth selected by the charterer.[98] Where, however, a charterer with the right to name the place of discharge fails to do so within a reasonable time, the master may select one.[99] It is the duty of the charterer, in the absence of some specific stipulation to the contrary, to furnish a berth for the vessel,[1] and a delay due to the congested condition of the port is chargeable to the charterer and not to the vessel [2]

Time for discharge. When the obligation to discharge the cargo rests on the charterer[3] and no time is specified within which discharge shall be done, the law implies an agreement on his part to discharge within a reasonable time under the circumstances,[4] and he is liable for delay in failing to do so, as discussed infra § 210. However, under a charter which required the ship to be fitted in every way for service, and to have steam winches at the charterer's disposal, the charterer was held entitled to an allowance for delay in discharging due to defective winches or deficiency in steam power for operating them.[5]

Injury to cargo on wharf. Where the bill of lading provides for delivery from the ship's deck, when the ship's responsibility shall cease, the obligation to protect the cargo on the wharf is on the charterers, if reasonable opportunity to take delivery from the ship's deck has been furnished,[6] and although a ship as a common carrier, where she selects her wharf for discharging, is answerable for its sufficiency until the lapse of a reasonable time for removal of the goods by the consignee,[7] she is not responsible for the collapse of a wharf, apparently sound and in good condition, under the weight of cargo discharged onto it when the wharf was selected by the consignee in accordance with the terms of the charter,[8] and the collapse occurs through secret defects of which the ship had no notice, and the amount of cargo deposited on the wharf was not unusual or excessive for a sound wharf.[9]

Duty of consignee to receive and discharge cargo. Where the consignee is under the obligation to discharge cargo, he will be required to discharge with reasonable dispatch,[10] and when he refuses to receive the cargo in accordance with the provisions in the charter party, the master is authorized to land the cargo and store it at the nearest proper and convenient port, having reference to his own convenience and the apparent best interests of its owner, and acting prudently and in good faith.[11]

c. Employment of Stevedore

In the absence of any agreement to the contrary in the charter party, or any different custom of the port, the vessel is entitled to select and employ a competent stevedore to load the cargo furnished it by the charterer.

In the absence of any agreement to the contrary in the charter party,[12] or any different custom of the port,[13] the vessel is entitled to select and employ a competent stevedore to load the cargo furnished

it by the charterer.[14] A charter which provides that "the stevedore employed by the vessel to be approved by charterer" means that the appointment or nomination of a stevedore is to be made in the first instance by the vessel,[15] and submitted to the charterer for approval,[16] and although the charterer has wide discretion as to approval or disapproval,[17] he cannot arbitrarily or unreasonably withhold what is reasonable under the circumstances.[18] A stipulation that the ship is to employ the charterer's stevedore and clerk does not amount to a special agreement that the charterer shall perform the duty of lading and stowing, or make them responsible for the character of the stowage.[19] The charterer has been held not liable for damage to cargo by stevedores appointed by the charterer but paid by the ship, who separated bundles of cargo to make broken stowage, and thus put more cargo in the ship.[20]

a. In General

Where a vessel is chartered, the costs of loading and discharging cargo will be apportioned in accordance with the terms of the charter party, although in the absence of any contractual provision on the subject the shipowner ordinarily must load and unload cargo at his own expense.

Where a vessel is chartered, the costs of loading and discharging cargo will be apportioned in accordance with the terms of the charter party.[21] In the absence of any provision on the subject in the contract the shipowner ordinarily must load[22] and unload[23] cargo at his own expense, but, if extra expense is incurred in loading simply to enable the charterer to carry a greater load, the extra expense must be borne by the charterer.[24] Depending on the provisions of the contract, the charterer has been held liable for wages and board of tallymen and checkers employed by him,[25] and also for assorting,[26] transferring,[27] piling,[28] placing in storage of,[29] and caring for,[30] the cargo, and for costs of screwing cargo in holds to enable him to carry a greater cargo.[31]

Where on bankruptcy of the charterers the cargo owner orders the cargo discharged in a manner not in accordance with the contract between him and the charterers, the owner of the vessel may recover the additional expense of so doing from the cargo owner.[32] Under a charter party which requires the charterer to load the cargo at his expense under the supervision of the master, the owner may be responsible for expense and loss caused by the master's neglect of his duty to see to the proper and safe loading of the vessel.[33] Where a ship was permitted to proceed on the own-

Cranage

Charter party provision that ship should pay "cranage if shore cranes are employed" required ship to pay reasonable and customary charge for shore cranage services even where cranes used belonged to charterer, not only where charterer was required to pay others for cranage services, and charterer's failure to charge other ships for cranage in discharging cargoes did not preclude him from asserting ship's liability—The August, D.C.N.Y., 5 F Supp. 463.

Loading in absence of master

Where charter party provided that charterer should load, stow, and trim cargo at its expense under master's supervision, and vessel was loaded during absence of master, for whom mate was acting, owner was liable to charterer for expense and loss due to delay necessitated by partial unloading and retrimming, where there was no proof that charterer loaded any cargo except with full knowledge of the mate or that charterer tolled master away or that he left ship except at his own volition—Mobile, Miami & Gulf S. S Co. v. Lake Giltedge S. S Co, supra.

er's agreement to return part of the cargo for action of a prize court, and through duress the charterer was compelled to pay storage on the goods in another country and for their return, it was held that the charterer was entitled to recover the amount from the owner.[34]

Sacks. Although a custom of the port imposes on the vessel a duty of making delivery in sacks, the vessel is not under an obligation to furnish sacks free of cost to the charterer,[35] and, where cargo is to be transported in sacks, the charterer may be liable for the costs of sewing them.[36]

Pilotage; costs of moving vessel. Under a charter party so providing, the charterer is obligated to furnish and pay for pilotage,[37] and the extent of his liability depends on the terms of the charter party.[38] In the absence of a provision imposing liability, the charterer is not liable for the costs of pilotage from one dock to another for the purpose of bunkering[39] or for costs of moving the vessel by order of a navigation commissioner.[40]

Ice breaking. A charterer is not liable to the owner for a sum paid for an icebreaker's services rendered at the request of the captain acting as the agent of the owner.[41]

b. Lighterage

The terms of the charter party control with respect to responsibility for the expense of lighterage.

The terms of the charter party control with respect to responsibility for the expense of lighterage,[42] and, where the charter party provides that the custom of a port is to be observed in all cases not especially expressed, a custom relative to the payment of lighterage, which is certain and general, although not so notorious or so acquiesced in as to have the force of law, will be carried out in the absence of an express stipulation on the subject in the charter party.[43]

Under a charter party stipulating that the charterer shall deliver a cargo on board at his expense of lighterage, it is necessarily implied that he will both lighter the cargo and pay for lighterage,[44] and his obligation is not fulfilled by depositing the cargo on a wharf.[45] It has been held that, when the vessel cannot reach the appointed dock because of an obstructing bridge, the charterer is liable for the cost of lighterage.[46] Where a vessel, in order to earn greater freight, gets the shipper to furnish, at a deeper anchorage, cargo in addition to what he had furnished at the agreed place of loading, the cost of lighterage must be borne by the vessel,[47] and delivery to the lighter is delivery to the vessel.[48] Where the charter party so stipulates, lighterage at the ports both of departure and destination must be at the expense of the merchant.[49]

c. Wharfage

The parties will be responsible for wharfage in accordance with the terms of their contract with respect both to loading and unloading, but usually the obligation of paying wharfage is on the vessel and the owners.

The parties will be responsible for wharfage in accordance with the terms of their contract,[50] with respect both to loading and unloading,[51] but usually the obligation of paying wharfage is on the vessel[52] and the owners.[53] Where a vessel, in order to make the delivery required by the terms of the charter, is compelled to enter a dock, and for this purpose enters the dock of the charterer, the vessel is liable to him for the ordinary charges for wharf-

age in like manner as at any other wharf,[54] and where a vessel under the obligation to pay wharfage is sent by the charterer to a railroad wharf where, in consideration of loading the railroad company's goods, no wharfage is charged, the charterer has been held to be entitled to charge the vessel with the stipulated wharfage less credit due for rebate allowed the charterer by the stevedore.[55]

A charterer bound by the contract to furnish the vessel with a berth for discharging will be required to pay extra wharfage incurred through his failure to furnish a proper berth.[56] Where the charterer contracts with a third person for wharfage of the vessel without disclosing that he is acting for anyone else, the charterer may be liable therefor to such third person,[57] although by the terms of the charter, as between the owner and the charterer, the owner may be primarily liable for wharfage of the vessel.[58] The vessel will not ordinarily be required to pay wharfage for use of a pier designated by the charterer after her cargo has been discharged thereon,[59] and the owner of a vessel chartered to one who becomes owner pro hac vice is not responsible for wharfage incurred after the latter has chartered the vessel.[60]

Dockage. Wharfage chargeable to charterers under the charter party includes dockage,[61] which may be based on the tonnage of the ship.[62] Dockage should be apportioned between the parties according to their contract.[63]

d. Stevedoring

The expense of stevedoring should be borne by the party responsible therefor, in accordance with the provisions of the charter party.

The expense of stevedoring should be borne by the party responsible therefor, in accordance with the provisions of the charter party.[64] Under some charter provisions, only the charterer is liable for such expense,[65] and a charter providing for payment of a stevedore by the charterer is not affected by a usage, unknown to the master, for the master to pay the stevedore for unloading.[66] A charterer who, by the terms of the charter party, is bound to pay stevedoring charges cannot bind the owner to pay such charges;[67] in the absence of a grant of such authority to him, a charterer who is not the owner pro hac vice does not have authority to bind the vessel for claims of stevedores,[68] and the shipowner is not liable for stevedoring because the charterer made misrepresentations as to his authority.[69] A shipowner is not liable for stevedoring rendered the charterer under a charter party providing for the employment of a stevedore where such charter also requires the charterer to load and stow the cargo at a specified rate.[70]

Under some charter provisions the vessel may be responsible for the expense of stevedoring,[71] but a vessel under the obligation to pay the cost of stevedoring, not exceeding a certain rate,[72] and to discharge night and day if required,[73] cannot be required to pay in excess of the stipulated rate because of night work. If the charterer himself provides the stevedoring he is not entitled to more than the service would have cost the ship.[74]

Winchmen. Under a charter party requiring the vessel to provide winchmen, the obligation is fulfilled by tendering competent winchmen from the crew,[75] and, if their services are refused because stevedores employed by the charterer refuse to, work with them[76] or for other reason,[77] the cost of employing other winchmen cannot be charged against the vessel or owners. However, under some circumstances the charterers may be entitled to deduct from the charter hire sums paid to outside winchmen used with the consent of the master.[78]

e. Port Charges

Payment of port charges is usually regulated by the terms of the charter party, and in accordance therewith the parties will be liable only for such charges as they have agreed to pay.

Payment of port charges is usually regulated by the terms of the charter party,[79] and in accordance therewith the parties will be liable only for such charges as they have agreed to pay.[80] In order that a charge may constitute a port charge, it must be a lien on a ship, either maritime or statutory, which she has to pay before she is entitled to leave port,[81] so that a charge for the inspection of cargo by a maritime committee or a maritime branch of an exchange before loading is not a port charge, where such charge is not a lien on the ship.[82]

Port charges may include "berth"[83] or "towage,"[84] and, in accordance with the stipulations in a charter party for the charterers to pay certain "port charges," they have been held obligated to pay costs of "wharfage,"[85] "shed hire,"[86] "pilotage,"[87] "tonnage dues,"[88] "customhouse fees,"[89] "levee dues,"[90] "quarantine fees,"[91] and "cost of watching."[92] While under the terms of the charter party, the "cost of fumigating" may constitute a port charge for which the charterer is liable,[93] as where the necessity for fumigation grows out of the ship's service under the charter,[94] under some charter party provisions the charterer has been held not liable for such expense where fumigation is required for the contemplated voyage when the ship is delivered to him.[95]

f. Agency Fees

Liability for agents' fees ordinarily is determined by the provisions of the charter party.

Liability for agents' fees ordinarily is determined by the provisions of the charter party.[96] Where the owners are bound by the charter party to pay only the usual charge for charterer's agents' fees, and such agents refuse to act for less than a sum greater than such charge, the owners are not bound to employ them,[97] and, on paying the sum demanded, they are entitled to recover from the charterer any amount above the usual charge,[98] but, in the absence of proof as to what the usual charge is, nothing will be allowed them.[99] Where a charter party confines the duties of a ship's agent to "custom-house business," he is not the general representative of the ship, and is not entitled to an "attendance fee."[1]

a. In General

As a general rule, in order to be entitled to charter money or freight money, the owner of the vessel must perform his contract, and, where there has been no complete fulfillment on his part and no fault or waiver on the other part, no freight money can be recovered, notwithstanding the failure to perform is not due to his fault.

As a general rule, in order to be entitled to charter money or freight money, the owner of the vessel must perform his contract,[2] and, where there has been no complete fulfillment on his part and no fault or waiver on the other part, no freight money can be recovered,[3] notwithstanding the failure to perform is not due to his fault.[4] Thus, no freight is earned if there is no delivery of cargo because the vessel is wrecked[5] or captured,[6] or because of the intervention of war.[7] Ordinarily, there is no implied promise to pay a compensation for carrying goods part of a voyage,[8] notwithstanding difficulty or improbability of accomplishing the undertaking,[9] unless the goods are voluntarily accepted at a place short of the port of destination,[10] although where a chartered vessel is disabled at an intermediate port, the master should be allowed a reasonable time within which to reship or transship, so as to earn his freight.[11]

If the delivery of the cargo is prevented by the neglect or default of the hirer, the owner will be entitled to the hire as if on actual delivery,[12] and, where the charterers refuse to order the vessel to such a port as the charter party calls for, and insist on ordering her to a different one, the shipowner is prima facie entitled to the freight which he would have earned, less what it would have cost him to earn it.[13] Where a charter party is so worded as to constitute a divisible contract the shipowner may be entitled to a ratable freight for the part of the goods carried on failure to carry the whole because of the perils of the sea,[14] or pro rata freight may be allowed to the shipowner for damaged cargo voluntarily accepted at an intermediate port.[15] Under a charter party which provides that freight is to be payable on "right delivery of cargo," only a delivery of all that the ship is bound to deliver is required, excluding losses by excepted sea perils, in order that freight may be earned.[16] A provision for payment of a lump sum as freight by the charterers to the owners on "true delivery of the cargo" has no reference to the poor condition of the cargo at the time of delivery.[17]

A charter provision that freight is to be considered earned "steamer or goods lost or not lost" has been held to mean that freight shall be considered earned notwithstanding any frustration of the voyage not caused by the act of the owner,[18] including frustration due to governmental embargo before the bill of lading containing such clause has been executed,[19] and when the vessel has not broken ground.[20] So, it has been held that a governmental requisition of a vessel under an order prohibiting the vessel from entering into time charters and requiring contemplated voyages to be approved by the government does not affect liability for freight under a charter containing such a provision

Capsizing of seaworthy vessel

Where lighters were seaworthy when delivered to charterer, and cause of capsizing was damage during charter period, and charterer did not explain the damage or show that damage was not due to charterer's fault, charterer to whom lighters were demised was liable to owners for charter hire.—Banks v. executed after the date of such requisition and before the date possession of the vessel is taken by the government,[21] even though there are minor defects in the engines of the vessel.[22] An owner is not precluded from recovering freight for a voyage frustrated by the act of a government, under a charter exempting him from responsibility for "restraints of princes, rulers, and people," where the voyage is delayed by continued temporary restraints culminating in the frustrating act when the vessel is taken over by the government.[23]

Time charter. Where a vessel is hired for a specified time and the charter money is earned at the expiration of specified intervals, although the vessel is lost before the voyage is completed, the stipulated compensation, due before the time of loss, is recoverable,[24] but an installment falling due after the loss of the vessel cannot be collected.[25]

Voyage out and return. Where a vessel is chartered for a voyage out and home, for a gross sum, the outward and homeward voyages are one, and the vessel's return is a condition precedent to the owner's right to freight,[26] and, even if freight is to be paid at a monthly rate, the contract may be indivisible and the return of the vessel a condition precedent to payment of freight.[27] However, if two voyages, one outward and one homeward, are contemplated, and the vessel is lost on the latter, freight may be recovered for the outward voyage.[28]

b. Persons Liable

The charterer of a vessel is primarily liable for the freight money. One who arranges for the services of a vessel either as principal or as agent for an undisclosed principal is a party to the charter so as to be liable for charter hire.

The charterer of a vessel is primarily liable for the freight money.[29] One who arranges for the service of a vessel either as principal[30] or as agent for an undisclosed principal,[31] and not as agent for a disclosed principal,[32] is a party to the charter so as to be liable for charter hire. Where, in consideration of the assignment of the hire due on a charter party, the assignee agrees to pay a stated sum and the assignor agrees that if the sum shall exceed the money due by the charterers he will refund, the assignee assumes the obligations of the charterers to pay.[33] One who receives and sells the cargo under an agreement with the charterer is not liable for the freight money on the theory that the contracts among the parties are so closely related as to make him a charter principal.[34]

c. Retention or Restoration of Advance Freight

Ordinarily, freight which has been paid in advance is to be refunded if, from any cause not attributable to the shipper, the goods are not carried, unless there is a stipulation in the charter to the contrary.

Proximate cause of loss

Where charter party for vessel provided for prepayment of freight on completion of loading and telegraphic notice of signing of bill of lading, and voyage was frustrated by government and not by any defects in vessel's engines, act of government was proximate cause of loss of voyage, warranting recovery of freight —Mitsubishi Shoji Kaisha, Limited v. Societe Purfina Maritime, supra.

Valves in need of grinding

The fact that engine valves of vessel needed grinding did not constitute "unseaworthiness" so as to preclude recovery of freight for voyage frustrated by government under clause providing that freight was to be considered earned "ship and/or cargo lost or not lost"—Mitsubishi Shoji Kaisha, Limited v. is intended to control the usual rule of law, must be expressed in terms so unambiguous as to leave no doubt that such was the intention of the parties.[37]

Under a charter providing that, in the event of loss of use of the vessel exceeding a specified time, payment of hire should cease for the time lost, a charterer having paid for hire in advance is entitled to recover for loss of use of the vessel while stranded, on proof that loss of use exceeded the time specified,[38] but the charterer is entitled to a return of only the unearned portion of the moneys prepaid by him where the ship's engine breaks down because of a latent defect therein.[39] Under a charter provision "freight earned, retained and irrevocable, vessel lost or not lost" it has been held that the vessel can retain prepaid freight where it is forced by injuries from storm to return to port and a second departure is rendered impossible by an embargo laid against sailing vessels bound for a war zone.[40]

§ 43. —— Amount and Rate

a. In general
b. Time charter hire
c. Claims, deductions, and offsets by charterer

a. In General

The terms of the charter party control with respect to the amount or rate of freight to be paid by the charterer of a vessel where such amount or rate is stipulated therein.

The terms of the charter party control with respect to the amount or rate of freight to be paid by the charterer of a vessel where such amount or rate is stipulated therein.[41] Thus, freight may be fixed according to the weight or measure of the cargo shipped,[42] payable for the whole amount, although part is damaged or lost.[43] If a specified load is contracted for, the owner usually is entitled to the full freight even though through the act of the charterer less is carried.[44]

An owner may be entitled to recover from a charterer a reasonable amount, in addition to the stated charter freight, for the carriage of a deck cargo not provided for by the charter,[45] and where a ship, chartered to carry a specified cargo, is loaded with another cargo it has been held that a promise is implied on the part of the charterer to pay at least as much as he would have been obliged to pay for the cargo specified.[46] However, under particular circumstances, such as where by reason of a mistake on the part of both the owner and the charterer an amount of cargo in excess of that specified in the contract was loaded, and the vessel was detained because of the additional weight, it has been held that the owner cannot recover more than the stipulated amount.[47]

Pro rata freight. Where a charterer, on acceptance of his goods at an intermediate port instead of at the port of destination, is required to pay pro rata freight, the amount he has to pay is measured by the benefit he has received,[48] based on the proportion in rates of freight between the port of shipment and the ports of acceptance and destination.[49]

b. Time Charter Hire

(1) In general
(2) Under off-hire clause

(1) In General

Under a time charter, the time when hire begins or ends generally depends on the provisions of the charter relative thereto, although, in a charter for an indefinite period, the stipulated hire usually continues until the end of at least one complete trip.

Under a time charter, the time when hire begins[50] or ends[51] generally depends on the provisions of the charter relative thereto, although, in a charter for an indefinite period, the stipulated hire usually continues until the end of at least one complete trip.[52] In the absence of a charter provision for the cessation of hire under certain conditions or circumstances,[53] hire ordinarily runs continuously.[54] However, charter hire may not be payable for a period during which the vessel cannot be used by the charterer because of its seizure under private legal process,[55] and, as a rule, no hire is payable for the time during which the ship is put into condition to carry the cargo for which she is chartered,[56] or for the time the ship is delayed in commencing[57] or during[58] her service under the charter because of the failure of the owner to perform his charter obligations.

In accordance with charter provisions, the charterer may be held liable for time spent by the vessel in obedience to governmental orders,[59] or in saving life and property,[60] notwithstanding the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act.[61] Where the vessel is damaged through fault of the charterer the owner has been held entitled to hire until the ship is fully repaired and he again has use of his property,[62] and, under a charter at a certain rate per day until the vessel is returned in as good a condition as when received by the charterer, the owner has been held entitled to charter hire until the vessel is returned to him in good condition.[63] The charter party may stipulate that charter money is not to cease under certain circumstances.[64]

Overlap. Where a time charter contemplates a possible overlap, unless the market rate in payment of overtime is stipulated for, the owner will be entitled to the charter rate only.[65] Where the charterer had the right to set out on an overlapping voyage, but did not, the owner was held entitled to hire only to the date when the vessel could be legally redelivered.[66]

(2) Under Off-Hire Clause

A provision in a time charter to the effect that charter money shall not be payable for time lost by reason of the occurrence of a specified contingency or contingencies should be construed and given effect according to the intent of the parties.

A provision in a time charter to the effect that charter money shall not be payable for time lost by reason of the occurrence of a specified contingency or contingencies should be construed and given effect according to the intent of the parties,[67] and should not be enlarged by implication.[68] So it has been held that, under the terms of a breakdown clause, a vessel is not off-hire when she is able to combat whatever adverse weather she encounters;[69] or when detained by ice, where such detention is not caused by an accident but merely by adverse weather conditions,[70] or when her rudder is injured by ice, but the vessel loses no time because of such injury or the repair thereof,[71] although she has to be helped in order to reach port.[72] Under a provision permitting the vessel to be laid up for overhauling free of hire at a time designated by the charterer, if the charterer lays up the vessel merely as a subterfuge to evade payment of hire, the charter money must be paid as if the vessel were actually in commission.[73]

Where the contingency stipulated in the charter occurs charter money is not payable for the time lost by reason thereof,[74] as where damages prevent the working of the vessel,[75] where the vessel is unfit for use because of any defect in her outfit,[76] where the vessel's machinery breaks down,[77] where there is a deficiency of men on the vessel,[78] or where the vessel is detained by reason of the restraint of princes, rulers and people.[79] The right to off-hire, otherwise existing, is not lost by non-user of the vessel.[80]

Time when hire ceases or resumes. If, under the terms of an off-hire clause, hire is to cease after a specified contingency has lasted a certain number of hours, the charterer cannot tack together several lesser periods to make the requisite period.[81] Where hire is to cease in the event of damage preventing the working of the vessel until she be again in an efficient state to resume her service, hire is payable from the moment when the repairs are completed, and the ship is in efficient condition for working.[82] In determining the period during which a vessel is off-hire, the service of the vessel in carrying cargo is to be distinguished from her service in loading or unloading it.[83]

c. Claims, Deductions, and Offsets by Charterer

In general, a charterer of a vessel is entitled to such deductions or remittances from the charter hire or freight money as are called for under the terms of the charter party or other agreement.

In general, a charterer of a vessel is entitled to such deductions or remittances from the charter hire or freight money as are called for under the terms of the charter party or other agreement,[84] express[85] or implied.[86] Accordingly, a charterer may be entitled to a deduction from freight money, or to an offset against such money, for any loss sustained by him because of a breach of duty or obligation on the part of the owner,[87] such as a breach of duty which results in damage to,[88] or loss of,[89] cargo; or a breach of duty causing a delay in the vessel's arrival,[90] departure,[91] or progress,[92] or causing a delay in the delivery,[93] or discharge,[94] of cargo.

The charterer may be entitled to a deduction or offset for a loss suffered by him by reason of the refusal of the owner to load a full cargo,[95] or because of the owner's failure to transport all the goods contracted for.[96] Moreover, although under a cesser or off-hire clause the charterer may not deduct expenses incidental to the vessel's being off-hire,[97] under some time charter provisions, the charterer may be entitled to a deduction from charter hire for a period during which the vessel is off-hire.[98]

In order that a charterer may be entitled to an offset against charter hire or freight money his claim must not be too remote,[99] and, furthermore, a charterer will not be entitled to a deduction or offset for a loss suffered by him as a result of his own or his agents' acts,[1] as where a delay or abandonment of the voyage is caused by the charterer's own action.[2] So too, a charterer will not be entitled to a deduction by reason of a delay or abandonment of the voyage because of ordinary perils of navigation, of which the charterer has assumed the risk.[3]

Commissions. Under the terms of the charter party the charterer may be entitled to commission,[4] although the ship is lost before delivery.[5]

§ 44. —— Time and Manner of Payment

Generally the time and manner of payment of charter hire or other compensation depend on the provisions of the charter party properly construed.

Generally the time and manner of payment of charter hire or other compensation depend on the provisions of the charter party properly construed.[6] Freight is not due from the charterer until he has had full user of the vessel for the purpose for which he chartered it,[7] particularly where the charter party expressly so stipulates.[8]

Payment in advance. Under some charter party provisions, a charterer may be required to pay charter hire in advance,[9] notwithstanding that the owner obtains from the charterer a satisfactory guarantee that the charterer will duly perform his contract with respect to payment,[10] and where, under the circumstances, payment of charter hire in advance is vital to the contract, strict compliance with such a charter requirement is necessary.[11] However, the obligation of a charterer to pay freight in advance is not necessarily absolute under some charter provisions,[12] and, furthermore, the right to insist on a prepayment of charter hire may be waived by the owner.[13]

§ 45. —— Lien

a. Existence and extent
b Waiver, loss, or estoppel

a. Existence and Extent

As a general rule a shipowner whose vessel is chartered has a lien on the goods shipped for the freight due in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, except where the vessel itself is demised without an express reservation of such a lien in the charter.

Where, under the provisions of a charter party, the vessel itself is demised and the charterer thereby becomes her owner during the term of the contract, the general owner usually has no lien on the cargo for freight or charter hire, in the absence of an express reservation of such a lien in the charter.[14] However, as a general rule in other cases, in the absence of an agreement providing otherwise, a shipowner whose vessel is chartered has a lien on the goods shipped for the freight due,[15] regardless of the issuance of a bill of lading.[16] Accordingly, where, under the terms of the charter party, the shipowner is a bailee for the purpose of transportation as a private carrier, he has been held entitled to a lien on the cargo for charter hire;[17] and, where he merely lets the use of the vessel and retains possession and control of the navigation thereof with the master acting as his agent and the mariners remaining in his employment, the goods of the charterer are liable to the owner of the ship to the full extent of the freight due on the charter party.[18]

While the shipowner may, in a proper case, be entitled to a lien on goods shipped by subfreighters,[19] unless the bill of lading is subject to the charter party,[20] the lien of the owner extends to the goods of each subfreighter only for the amount of freight due on his shipment under the bill of lading.[21] Where a shipper's freight has been prepaid to the charterer it has been held that there is nothing on which a lien can operate.[22] The parties may, by an express clause in the charter party, bind the cargo for the payment of the freight,[23] whether or not the charterer becomes the owner pro hac vice under the terms of the contract.[24] A lien so reserved in favor of a shipowner ordinarily has priority over rights subsequently created,[25] and a provision creating such a lien ordinarily is binding not only on the parties to the charter party but on third persons as well,[26] provided they have knowledge,[27] either actual or constructive,[28] of its terms. Thus, such a provision has been held binding on third persons who ship under a bill of lading expressly accepting the condition of the charter party[29] or who impliedly assent to it,[30] but not on a shipper who has paid the charterer in good faith without notice of the shipowner's rights,[31] or on a subcharterer who has paid the hire under its charter to the original charterer.[32]

Where provision is made in the original charter party for a shipowner's lien for the charter money such lien may be asserted as against a cargo owner to the extent of the freights due from him,[33] subject to proper set-offs or deductions on his part,[34] and where, as authorized by the charter party, the charterer fixes the freight to be paid by cargo shipped under bills of lading or by a subcharter, the shipowner may enforce his lien on the cargo for the freight due under the respective bills of lading or subcharter,[35] but for no more.[36] The rights of a shipowner under a charter party expressly giving him a lien on subfreights for any amounts due under the charter party and prohibiting the transfer of the charterer's rights without the shipowner's consent have been held not to be in abeyance pending repossession of the vessel by him.[37]

Dead freight. By the terms of the charter party, the owner may stipulate for a lien for dead freight,[38] binding not only on the parties, but on third persons who ship under bills of lading expressly accepting this condition of the charter party,[39] or who impliedly assent thereto.[40] A lien for dead freight, expressly reserved by the charter party, attaches the moment cargo is put on board.[41]

b. Waiver, Loss, or Estoppel

A shipowner who would otherwise be entitled to a lien for charter hire or freight on goods shipped under the provisions of a charter party may waive or lose his right to such lien by acts or conduct as well as by contract.

A shipowner who would otherwise be entitled to a lien for charter hire or freight on goods shipped under the provisions of a charter party may waive or lose his right to such lien by acts or conduct as well as by contract.[42] The owner of a ship, of which the charterer is not the lessee but the freighter only, will be held to have waived his lien on the cargo for freight, without express words to that effect, when it can be fairly inferred that he meant to trust to the personal responsibility of the charterer,[43] or, in the absence of a stipulation expressly reserving a lien in his favor,[44] where there are stipulations in the charter party inconsistent with the exercise of the lien,[45] such as a stipulation calling for unconditional delivery of the cargo,[46] for payment after delivery,[47] or for payment at a time and place other than the time and place of delivery.[48]

The lien of the owner of a ship on its cargo for freight is favored by the courts,[49] and the acts or conduct of the shipowner must be sufficient to constitute a waiver of the lien on his part.[50] Unless the special agreement is absolutely inconsistent with the retention of the goods, the right to a lien exists,[51] particularly where the charter expressly pledges the vessel and the cargo to each other for the performance of the contract;[52] and even if, under the original charter party, the right to a lien

may have been waived, where the parties have modified their contract so that time and place of payment have been changed to time and place of delivery, the owner will have his lien for the freight.[53]

The shipowner's lien for freight is not lost by the acceptance of a bill of exchange or promissory note for freight, if before delivery of the shipment, the bill or note is not met,[54] unless it is agreed between the parties that such payment, by bill or note, is actual payment.[55] In like manner, the shipowner's lien for freight on the goods of the charterer is not lost, although shipper and charterer have agreed that no freight shall be due,[56] even though the master of the ship has assented to such agreement.[57]

Estoppel. The shipowner, by his acts or conduct, may estop himself to assert a lien on the cargo,[58] as by issuing negotiable bills of lading falsely asserting the prepayment of freight.[59]

§ 46. Breach of Charter

Breach of the charter by the owner or master of the vessel is discussed infra § 47, breach by the charterer is discussed infra § 48, and the right of the charterer to a lien is discussed infra § 49.

a. In General

A breach of the charter by the owner or his agents will give the charterer a cause of action for damages against the owner,[60] unless the charterer has suffered no actual damage,[61] and it may also justify the charterer in repudiating or rescinding the charter.[62] What constitutes a breach of the charter by the owner or his agents warranting recovery of damages by the charterer or a repudiation of the charter by him depends on the terms of the charter properly construed.[63] A breach of

Where owner orally agreed to charter vessels to charterer for a period which would enable charterer to perform several voyages, and thereafter charterer under protest signed written charters which limited the term to a single round voyage, charterer could maintain libels for breach of oral charters, since written charters were required to be treated as a proper attempt to mitigate damages resulting from breach of oral charters, and written charters were not a substitute for oral agreements which remained in effect to extent that they were not included in written charters.—U. the owner or master may be waived by the charterer,[64] as by a subsequent agreement of the parties,[65] or the charterer may be estopped to assert a breach of the owner or master.[66]

b. Excuse of Performance

Ordinarily, performance of the charter by the owner will not be excused by the occurrence of unforeseen difficulties but it may be excused where it is made impossible by operation of law, or by the occurrence of a contingency specified in the charter, or by reason of an act by the charterer or his failure to act.

Ordinarily, unforeseen difficulties will not excuse performance of the charter by the owner,[67] although performance may be excused where made impossible by law;[68] an act by the charterer or his failure to act may also excuse the failure of the master or owner to perform the obligations of the charter party.[69] Moreover, performance by the owner may be excused under the terms of a charter provision excusing performance on his part by reason of the occurrence of a specified contingency,[70] and, where a charter specifies certain contingencies which will excuse performance on the part of the owner, such provision will be given effect according to the intent of the parties.[71] The mere happening of an excepted peril before the time of the charter begins to run does not of itself terminate the obligation of the shipowner,[72] but it is the result of such happening that is the effective cause.[73]

"Restraint of princes, rulers, and people" clause or similar clause. In determining whether an owner is excused from performance under a charter containing a "restraint of princes, rulers, and people" clause, or a similar clause, the clause should be construed and given effect according to the intent of the parties,[74] and, under such a clause, in order that the owner may be excused from performance the restraint must emanate from recognized authority.[75] The restraint need not be by physical force,[76] but it must be actual,[77] and not merely patent or probable,[78] although a reasonable apprehension of capture or destruction of the ship or cargo will justify nonperformance by the owner,[79] so that where the degree of danger is beyond the rumored or fanciful and is actual and substantial, performance by the owner will be excused.[80] Under such a clause, the owner may not be required to carry contraband.[81] The arrest of the vessel under private legal process is not within the meaning of such a clause.[82]

Circumstances justifying reasonable apprehension
Whether apprehension of attack on a ship in time of war is to be considered reasonable and therefore a justification for not performing a contract of carriage depends on circumstances, especially on the degree of danger shown to be present, and shipowners and captains with protective clauses in contracts are not obliged to gamble with death to themselves or their ships, even if the chances are considerably in their favor, and if a real danger is present, apprehension of it cannot be said to be "unreasonable" because many vessels voluntarily take the risk and get through—The George J. Goulandris, supra.

Master's judgment
In determining rights and liabilities of parties to charter party on refusal of ship loaded with contraband to proceed following a declaration of war, it is immaterial whether captain used his sole judgment or whether he first used his own judgment in informing ship's agents he would not sign bills of lading and was afterwards supported by his owners—The George J. c. Damages

In accordance with the rules applicable with respect to damages for breach of contract generally, the charterer, on breach of the charter party by the owner, is entitled to recover such damages as will, as nearly as possible, make him whole, or compensate him for the loss sustained because of the breach.

In accordance with the rules applicable with respect to damages for breach of contract generally, the charterer, on breach of the charter party by the owner, is entitled to recover such damages as will, as nearly as possible, make him whole,[83] or compensate him for the loss sustained because of the breach.[84] The charterer is entitled to recover the damages which arise naturally and directly from the breach,[85] or which may fairly be presumed to have been within the contemplation of the parties when the contract was made[86] Such damages should be assessed, as near as may be, on the basis of what the charterer's situation would have been had the terms of the charter party been carried out by the owner,[87] and the cargo delivered as agreed on.[88]

In allowing damages to the charterer, the court is not bound by any fixed or precise measure,[89] since the measure of damages recoverable by the charterer varies in accordance with the particular terms of the charter involved and the facts and circumstances of the case.[90] Thus, where recovery is sought because of the failure of the charterer to procure the transportation which he has contracted for, the measure of damages, if other transportation is obtainable, ordinarily is the difference between the cost of such transportation and the charter hire,[91] subject to the limitation that the substituted means of transportation shall be reasonable and not extravagant,[92] and, if there is a market price for such transportation, the measure of damages is the difference between the market price and the charter hire.[93]

Where no other transportation is obtainable by the exercise of reasonable diligence the charterer has been held entitled to recover what he could have got for the vessel had she been delivered,[94] or the difference in value of the cargo at the shipping point and the place of destination, less the cost of transportation,[95] or the reasonable profits of the voyage under the circumstances,[96] or the net profits or earnings which he would have made were it not for the breach,[97] provided that such profits are

Since damages for breach of charter party are based on difference between market value of merchandise at port of destination and market value at port of shipment, less transportation charges, where cargo, which was not shipped because of breach of charter party, was ultimately sold on domestic market on a rising price level, no loss could be attributable to any delay in marketing the cargo occasioned by breach.—The Innerton, supra.

Charterer's finances preventing other transportation

The text rule is applicable even though the fact that charterer was unable to obtain another vessel may have been due to his financial condition, of which the owner had knowledge at time charter party was exe-susceptible of accurate estimation,[98] and the evidence with respect thereto is conclusive.[99] On the other hand, the charterer is not entitled to profits which are precluded by operation of law rather than by the failure of the owner to perform any duty imposed on him by the charter party.[1]

Duty to minimize damages. On breach of the charter party by the owner, it is the charterer's duty to use reasonable diligence to reduce his damage.[2] Accordingly, if by the exercise of reasonable diligence the charterer can procure another vessel in size, speed, and general qualities like that chartered, at a reasonable hire for the term of the voyage, it is his duty to do so.[3]

Damages due to act of charterer. The charterer cannot recover damages which arise because of his own voluntary act,[4] imprudence,[5] or inactivity.[6]

Remote or speculative damages. The charterer cannot recover damages which are speculative or uncertain,[7] or remote.[8]

Penalties or liquidated damages; nominal damages. In accordance with charter party provisions the owner may be bound to a penalty for a breach of the agreement on his part,[9] and although only damages actually suffered by the charterer because of the owner's breach may be recovered by him,[10] the actual damages suffered may be recovered even if they are in excess of the penal sum.[11] The charterer may recover the sum named in the charter if such sum may be regarded as liquidated damages.[12]

In the absence of evidence of actual damage for which recovery may be had, the charterer ordinarily can recover only nominal damages on breach of the charter party by the owner,[13] and this is true even where the charter binds the parties to a penalty for its breach.[14]

Future profits

In determining damages recoverable for owner's breach of charter, future profits to be derived by charterer in engaging in given trade were too uncertain to furnish basis for an award, where there was no established business and no contracts on which such profits could be based, and the boat was small vessel unsuited for such trade and not in position to compete for certain types of cargoes carried by regular lines.—Polar Steamship Corp. v. Safe place for discharge of cargo

In clause of charter party requiring charterer to procure safe "place" for discharge of cargo, quoted word meant spot selected to drop anchor plus area over which tanker might swing on tide and charterer's duty was not fulfilled merely by selecting area containing both safe and unsafe berths since clause required charterer to select safe berth in such area—Park S. Repair of engine

(1) Where charter party provided that chartered vessel should be seaworthy and in good condition as far as due diligence could make it and that charterer should keep vessel in good condition except that he should not be responsible for reasonable otherwise, where a charterer voluntarily enters into a charter party whereby he makes a positive agreement to do a lawful act he will not be absolved from liability for his failure to perform his part of the undertaking because of a subsequent impossibility of performance caused by an act of God,[16] or by an unavoidable accident,[17] and, where performance is possible and lawful, mere difficulty[18] or improbability[19] of accomplishing the undertaking will not ordinarily excuse performance on his part.

Where the charter party specifies certain contingencies which will excuse performance on the part of the charterer, such provision will be given effect according to the intent of the parties,[20] and performance by the charterer usually will not be excused, under such a provision, unless the occurrence of the contingency specified renders performance on his part impossible in a practical sense.[21] Thus, it is generally considered insufficient to excuse performance by the charterer that the happening of the contingency specified in the charter adds materially to the difficulties of the charterer,[22] or renders performance by him unprofitable.[23]

In the absence of a waiver by the owner of a breach on the part of the charterer of the terms of the charter party,[24] or acquiescence on the part of the owner in the charterer's default,[25] on a breach of agreement by the charterer, the shipowner ordinarily has an action for damages[26] and may be justified in refusing further compliance with the terms of the charter.[27] The owner's election to declare the breach or waive it is final.[28]

Right of withdrawal under charter. By the terms of the charter, the owner may have the right to withdraw the vessel for nonpayment of the charter hire,[29] and the charterer cannot deprive him of his right by any tender of the hire in arrear,[30] but, if there is any cargo on board, the owner cannot withdraw the vessel until the cargo is relanded, if the vessel is at the loading port,[31] or until it is discharged, if she is at sea or at destination.[32] A waiver by the owner of prompt payment of the wear and tear, or for any repairs or damage caused by any latent defect, charterer was not liable for engine's breakdown due to a worn and defective condition not discovered until engine was taken down—The Maurice R Shaw, D C Me, 46 F.Supp. 767.

(2) Failure of charterer to disassemble generator and carry out elaborate inspection to detect dislocated spacer piece in armature which ultimately grounded generator at sea and physically damaged it requiring charterer to incur towage expenses was not lack of due diligence to discover defect constituting breach of the charter—Atlantic Refining Co v. U. S., D C.Pa., 82 F.Supp 201.

Effective date of notice

The time when notice of withdrawal of the vessel given by the owner takes effect depends on the facts and circumstances of the particular case—Confederation of Switzerland v Compania De Vapores Arauco Panamena, S. A., supra.

hire due will not waive prompt payment of hire to become due, in so far as the owner's right to withdraw the vessel for nonpayment of hire is concerned,[33] and the mere payment of the charter hire past due will not reinstate a vessel withdrawn for the default, in the absence of any evidence that the parties intend thereby to reinstate her.[34] However, where the owner has given notice of withdrawal of the vessel he may, by his conduct, waive the effect of such notice.[35]

b. Damages

The measure of damages for a total breach of the charter party by the charterer, consisting in his failure to furnish a cargo or refusal of the vessel, is the net amount the vessel would have earned, less the net amount earned or less the net amount that might have been earned through the exercise of reasonable diligence. Damages recoverable for retention of the vessel after the expiration of the charter may be measured by the current rate of hire, the best going rate from the place of redelivery, or the rate stipulated for in the charter as liquidated damages.

The measure of damages for a total breach of the charter party by the charterer, consisting in his failure to furnish a cargo or refusal of the vessel, is the net amount the vessel would have earned,[36] less the net amount earned[37] or less the net amount that might have been earned, through the exercise of reasonable diligence, during the time required for performance,[38] or for making the voyage,[39] under the charter party. In estimating the damages recoverable by the owner, approximate accuracy usually is sufficient;[40] and, in the case of uncertainty and difficulty in determining the exact loss, it should fall as far as possible on the charterer.[41]

Equitable circumstances may be shown in mitigation of damages.[42] It is the duty of the owner or master in mitigation of the damages to secure another cargo by the exercise of reasonable diligence,[43] or to lease or use the vessel himself, if that can be done in the exercise of reasonable diligence,[44] but he is not obliged to go to another port for cargo,[45] to accept another cargo from the charterer on other terms than payment in advance, as under the charter,[46] or to treat an anticipatory breach as such.[47] Where the master does not show on what terms he has engaged with other parties, it has been held that he can recover only his primage and the excess of the freight in the charter party over the rates current when the contract was broken.[48] Should the owner sell the vessel before the expiration of the charter, he cannot recover for the rental of the vessel after the sale.[49]

Penalties. Where the charter binds the parties to a penalty for its breach, only damages actually suffered may be recovered.[50]

Breach not amounting to total breach. For the breach by the charterer of various provisions of the charter party, not amounting to a total breach, various measures of damage have been held to apply, and various items of damage have been held recoverable.[51] The measure of damages for dead freight is the gross freight on the cargo not shipped, less any expenses saved by the vessel because of not carrying it,[52] or the difference between the net freight for a full cargo of the goods contracted for, and what would have been netted by any other reasonable cargo which by due diligence could have been obtained.[53] Where goods are offered by a third person to make up the deficiency at reduced prices, which are current prices, it has been held that the master of the vessel must receive them and credit the original charterer with the earnings.[54] The charterer will not be allowed credit for time saved where it does not appear that the failure to load the amount stipulated enabled the vessel to start on its voyage sooner than it would have done.[55]

Failure to redeliver as agreed. Damages recoverable from a charterer for retention of the vessel after the expiration of the charter may be measured by the current rate of hire,[56] the best going rate from the place of redelivery,[57] or the rate stipulated for in the charter as liquidated damages,[58] but not by a higher rate than the charter hire, although the owner has notified the charterer that such would be the rate after the charter term, where the charterer has not consented and the detention was unavoidable.[59] Where the owner has entered on a new charter, he must minimize the damages by hiring a similar ship to carry out his obligation,[60] and he is then entitled to recover the difference between the hire he receives from the charterer of his own ship and the rate he has to pay in the market for the ship which he has substituted.[61]

The measure of damages for premature delivery has been held to be the difference between the rate of hire under the original charter and the amount paid under a later charter over the period within which the vessel should not have been redelivered.[62]

§ 49. —— Lien

Where the charterer loads the ship, under the charter party, he may have a lien on the ship for damages resulting to him from breach of the charter party on the part of the owner.

To a certain extent the engagements in charter parties are to be regarded as personal only, not affecting the vessel,[63] but where the charterer loads the ship, under the charter party, so that the owner has a lien on the goods on board for the freight, as discussed supra § 45, a reciprocal lien on the ship attaches in favor of the charterer[64] for the repayment of freight advanced, should the voyage be broken up by fault of the owner,[65] for freight due the charterer,[66] or for the charterer's damages because of breach of the charter party on the part of the owner.[67]

A wholly executory charter for the transportation of merchandise will not create a maritime lien on the vessel in favor of the charterer,[68] as where the vessel has never entered on performance[69] or where no goods have been put on board.[70] The receipt of part of the cargo called for by the charter party will not entitle the charterer to a lien on the vessel for damages caused by the refusal on the part of the owner to receive the rest of the cargo called for,[71] and the charterer will not be entitled to a lien on the vessel where the charter has been partly performed by the carriage and delivery of one or more, but not of all, of the cargoes to be carried.[72] However, the charterer may, on the breach of an executory charter party by the owner before the vessel has entered into performance of the contract, have a right to a lien on the vessel for provisions for the crew, where such provisions have been put aboard the ship by the charterer.[73]

§ 50. Loss of, or Injury to, Cargo

a. In general
b. Exemptions from liability
c. Damages

a. In General

In general, a shipowner may be held liable to a charterer or shipper for loss of, or injury to, cargo due to negligence, unseaworthiness, deviation, or other wrongful act, and he may also incur liability for the breach of a warranty in the charter party.

In general, the shipowner or vessel may be held liable to the charterer or shipper for loss of, or injury to, the cargo due to negligence,[74] unseaworthiness,[75] deviation;[76] failure to keep the cargo worthy;[77] improper management,[78] loading,[79] stowage,[80] or dunnage;[81] or the carriage of injurious goods.[82] Neither vessel nor owner is liable to a charterer or shipper for the acts of the charterer's or shipper's servants or agents.[83] A barge owner is not responsible for contributing to the damage of a cargo as a result of the sinking of the vessel off a dock, on the ground that the owner knew that the vessel would not lie afloat at the dock, where it does not appear that the boat would not lie afloat or that the owner knew that the barge would be damaged if she did not float.[84]

It has been judicially observed that, with respect to liability for cargo damage, the obligations resting on a charterer differ from those of the vessel.[85] A charter provision that there would be sufficient
